

AUM TAT SAT

DATTĀTREYA

The Way and the Goal

BY

HIS HIGHNESS

SRI JAYA CHAMARAJENDRA WADIYAR BAHADUR

G.C.B. , G.C.S.I., LL.D.

MAHARAJA OF MYSORE

Introduction by Dr. S. Radhakrishnan

MOTILAL BANARSIDASS

This paperbound edition 1982 Coombe Springs Press

*First published in Great Britain
George Allen & Unwin Ltd*

© George Allen & Unwin 1957

All rights reserved No part of this publication may be reproduced in any manner or form or by any means of electronic photographic or mechanical reproduction or by audio recording or by any information storage or retrieval system or method available now or in the future without the prior permission in writing of Coombe Springs Press Ltd

ISBN 0 900306 94 7

*Published by Coombe Springs Press, England on behalf of Motilal Banarsidass
Bungalow Road
Jawahar Nagar
Delhi 110 007
India*

*Printed in Great Britain Chelms University Press, Oxford
by Eric Buckley Printer to the University*

DEDICATION

TO MY MOTHER

who showed me the light of Datta, most gracious Lady, Her Highness Srī Kempu Cheluvājammāṇṇi Avaru, the Yuvarāṇi of Mysore, an example of the highest order of Indian womanhood, a great devotee and a loving and benign mother,

this book is most respectfully dedicated by her devoted and loving son, Jaya Chamaraja Wadiyar

and

To Mrs. Adiraja Urs, my maternal grandmother, who kindled in me an interest in Lord Datta, and was herself a great upāsakī of the Lord, this book is respectfully dedicated in affection, love and the deepest respect by her grandson, Jaya Chamaraja Wadiyar.

INTRODUCTION

IN this book, Dattātreyā, the author who is the Maharaja of Mysore and at present Governor of the Mysore State, gives us English translations of Jīvanmukta Gītā and Avadhūta Gītā with his own commentary. These treatises expound the Advaitā Vedānta philosophy, which offers the basis for a sympathetic understanding among different religions. The representation of Dattātreyā as a being with three faces indicates the fundamental oneness of the three gods Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Śiva. eka eva tridhā smṛtaḥ, one only but conceived as threefold. The works here brought together speak of the spirit behind all religions independent of the restrictions of dogma. Since this experience of reality cannot be adequately described, we must be gentle with the different versions of the experience. Spiritual humility should be our attitude and not dogmatic pride or intolerance. The forms we worship are the splintered images of the Divine Reality. This synthetic vision which is the characteristic of Hindu thought from its beginnings in the Veda has in it the healing of the divisions among religions today.

The Advaita system which this book develops believes in the realisation of the Eternal as the goal of religion. The Upanisad says, 'I have known the supreme person, the radiant one, beyond the dark clouds' vedāham etam puruṣam mahāntam, ādityavarṇam tamasaḥ parastāt. Religions spring from the encounters of human beings with the Absolute Reality that is in and at the same time beyond all the phenomena of existence, life and history. The individual soul may commune with God at any time, in any place and in any historical circumstances. The individual can by austerity and discipline discover the divine in him and establish the superiority of the inner man over the environmental conditions. The experience is communicated and conveyed to mankind as the inspiration for a new way of life. When once we discover the divine in us, we become freed from egotism.¹

*rāga-dvesa-vinirmuktaḥ sarva-bhūta-hite-rataḥ dṛḍha-bodhaś ca dhīraś ca
gacchet paramam padam||*

¹ cp Tejobindu Upanisad aḥam brahmeti niścitya, aḥam bhāvam parityaja

He who is free from attachment and aversion, who is intent on doing good to all creatures, whose knowledge is stable and who is courageous attains to the highest truth.¹ All religions express the eternal voice of hope calling upon us to renounce hatred and greed. There is no chance of transforming the world into a juster, kinder, and gentler place than by the practice of unselfishness in individual and social matters.

The writer's translations and notes reveal his vast learning and deep devotion. The writer is not merely a theoretical student but a practising disciple, a sādhaka. He not only points out how the two works are rooted in the classical scriptures of Hinduism but are endorsed by his own personal experience. His comments on the different metaphysical questions, the concept of Dattātreya, the nature of the Absolute Reality, the status of the world, the practice of meditation, the individual self and the meaning of liberation or spiritual freedom are always interesting and often illuminating. Those who read this book will have a rewarding experience.

S. RADHAKRISHNAN.

24/12/56.

¹ Avadhūta Gītā 11.24.

CONTENTS

Preface		page	AN
I	THE DIVINE IN MAN (Īśvarānugraha):		3
	1. The Urge for Philosophy		3
	2. The Philosophic Vision (Pratibhā)		13
II	DATTĀTREYA: THE ABSOLUTE		21
	1. Dattātreyā: A Sketch		21
	2. Dattātreyā: Meditation		51
III	DATTĀTREYA: THE SPIRITUAL DISCIPLINE:		56
	1. Dattātreyā The Liberated in Life (Jīvanmukta-Gītā)		56
	2. Dattātreyā: The Incarnation		74
IV	DATTĀTREYA: THE PHILOSOPHER (Avadhūta).		86
	1. The Presupposition of Dattādvaita (The Philosophy of the Avadhūta-Gītā)		86
	2. Dattādvaita : Epistemology, Ontology and the Theory of Liberation		118
	3. The Avadhūta-Gītā .		151
	Translation and the background of Śruti		152
V	A CRITICAL ESTIMATE OF THE PHILOSOPHY OF DATTĀTREYA (with its background)		238
	1. Dattātreyā The Truth of Equipoise		238
	2. Dattātreyā: The All-Complete		249
	Index		283

FOREWORD

THIS book is primarily an attempt on the part of the author to rise above ignorance and obtain a glimpse of the truth. The grace of the Lord has been itself the inspiration for this attempt to serve Him. This humble tribute has been written to interest thinking men in this noble subject and induce them to traverse this great road of love and faith. The author is only too conscious of his own limitations; but, as all that there is in him is of Lord Datta, he has ventured on this token of his devotion.

ŚRĪ GURU DATTĀTREYO VIJAYATE

ACKNOWLEDGMENT

I MUST express my deep gratitude to Prof. H. N. Raghavendrachar and Prof M. Yamunacharya for their assistance in bringing this book to its present shape. I am greatly fortified to know that the book has been scrutinized by them. May Datta protect them always!

To many others who have helped me I offer sincere thanks I wish to mention three persons in particular for their unstinted co-operation and help—Major L. Mahadevaiah, Sri C. R. Soob Rau and Sri Sri Datta Sarma May the Lord Datta always guide and protect them!

The views expressed are entirely my own and no one else is responsible for them.

JAYA CHAMARAJA WADIYAR

PREFACE

Dattātreyam gurum devam dhyāyannīśam sadāśivam tanmantram tasya gītām ca vyākurve tat prasādatah

'Dattātreyā, the Teacher and the Deity,
I meditate on Him, the Lord, the ever-holy Lord,
His hymn and His song too
Do I expound by His irresistible grace.'

HINDU Mythology and Iconography have represented Dattātreyā as a Being with three faces, one the face of Brahmā, the other of Viṣṇu and the third of Śiva of the Hindu pantheon. He has six hands of which the three right ones hold respectively a trident, a rosary and a lotus-flower and the three left ones hold discus, conch and the ascetic's water-pot. The three heads stemming from the same trunk represent the powers of creation, preservation and destruction which are present in the universe as being the functions that emanate from one and the same Reality although each function is designated differently. The discus and the conch are associated with Viṣṇu, the trident and the ascetic's water-pot with Śiva, and the rosary and the lotus with Brahmā. These are the myths and symbols suggestive of the rich exuberance of India's philosophy, religion and art. The trinity (trimūrti) emanating from a unity (ekam sat) indicates the synthetic vision of the unity of things which has given life to Indian Philosophy down the ages. The four dogs portrayed at the feet of Dattātreyā represent the four Vedas which follow at the feet of the Lord as hounds of heaven and watch-dogs of truth, owned by Dattātreyā, the Great Hunter for the souls of men. The ochre coloured garb of Dattātreyā symbolizes sanyāsa, the spirit of renunciation or detachment without which realization of ultimate truth would only be a half-hearted effort and infructuous in the extreme.

It is the synthetic philosophy of the Veda that finds an embodiment in Dattātreyā and his philosophy is expounded in two important works known as the Avadhūta-Gītā and the Jīvanmukta Gītā. These works are unknown to the wider world but deserve rediscovery. My object in this work is to present a faithful and close interpretation of the philosophy contained in the Gītās mentioned above and to set forth its implications in the light of Vedic thought. This, I hope, will bring out the most vital truths of a dynamic philosophy of life, a dynamic morality and a dynamic religion leading to the regeneration of mankind which is becoming oblivious of the finer and deeper values of life in its hot pursuit of power, pleasure and profit.

Dattātreyā as ultimate Truth and ultimate Reality is the theme of this work consisting of five chapters. Dattātreyā is the teacher and the embodiment of this truth. He is the way and the goal as well. The Śāṇḍilya-Upaniṣad holds up this truth and declares it to be the cream of vedāntic thought. The task I have embarked upon is by no means easy but the urge for expression that surged up within me was like an experience of irresistible Divine Grace (Īśvarānugraha) but for which this work would not have seen the light of day. The ineffable experience of divine grace led me on to articulate to myself the thoughts that occurred to me in the course of sādhana or spiritual endeavour mapped out to the initiate.

I have started the work with discussing how the grace of the Lord (Īśvarānugraha) is the efflorescence of the divine in man and how it expresses itself in the urge for philosophy and culminates in philosophic vision, pratibhā. This forms the content of the first chapter which I have named 'The Divine in Man (Īśvarānugraha)'.

In the second chapter entitled 'Dattātreyā: The Absolute', I have attempted to sketch briefly the absolute character of this truth in the light of the teaching of Śruti or Revelation wherein this truth is expounded. In this connection I have selected a verse from Śāṇḍilya-Upaniṣad and interpreted it according to the Vedic tradition. The sketch of the Absolute is the fruit of meditation on the Absolute. Against it there can be no meditation consistent with the truth. The Absolute being all-comprehensive, the meditation on It must be the complete recognition of Its absolute or omnipotent character. To illustrate this truth I have selected a passage from the Dattātreyā Upaniṣad presenting the correct form of meditation and interpreting it consistently with the Vedic spirit in the latter part of the chapter.

The third chapter is entitled 'Dattātreyā: The Spiritual Discipline'. Dattātreyā is both the goal (upēya) and the discipline (upāya), for, nothing can fall outside the Absolute. Meditation is spiritual discipline. It is not outside the Absolute. Indiscipline is equated with bondage and discipline is equated with liberation. Dattātreyā being the embodiment of spiritual discipline is necessarily a person and he is necessarily the unfettered soul though embodied, *jīvanmukta. By way of illustrating Dattātreyā as the liberated while alive, I have, in the former part of this chapter, translated and explained the Jīvanmukta-Gītā attributed to Dattātreyā. In the second part is given an account of Dattātreyā's incarnation as an illustration of the gracious attributes of Dattātreyā.

The fourth chapter is entitled 'Dattātreyā: The Philosopher (Avadhūta)'. I have named the philosophy taught by Dattātreyā, the teacher, Dattādvaita, i.e. Datta as advaita. This chapter is divided into three parts. In the first part an account of the presuppositions of this philosophy is given. The ultimate truth is transcendent. With regard to it the only source of knowledge is Veda. A conscious recognition of this fact is the presupposition of Dattādvaita. The second part presents an account of epistemology, ontology and the theory of liberation of Dattādvaita. This is the philosophy embodied in the Avadhūta-Gītā taught by Dattātreyā. I have therefore in the third chapter translated this work with necessary notes. Dattādvaita is the Vedic philosophy which does full justice to all aspects of Vedic teaching. It is the philosophy of perfection and plenitude, pūrṇa resulting in sama, equality, equanimity and equipoise as expounded, for example, in the Bṛhadāraṇyaka-Upaniṣad. For the purpose of illustrating this truth which runs like a golden thread in India's philosophy, at the end of the translation of each verse in the first two chapters of the Avadhūta-Gītā the corresponding Upaniṣadic texts are given.

The fifth chapter is entitled 'A Critical Estimate of Dattādvaita with Its Background'. I have herein attempted to indicate how the urge for philosophy ultimately results in Dattādvaita or the philosophy of Equipoise and how this has given a fresh impetus to the spiritual aspirant. Next follow concluding remarks.

As already indicated, the whole literature constituting the Vedic tradition is kept in view in expounding the truth of Dattātreyā. In a work of this description a systematic reference to relevant works belonging to Śruti and Smṛti becomes inevitable. The body of the exposition therefore incorporates the translation of Sanskrit texts. The translation is given within inverted commas, At the close of the translation of each Sanskrit text a number is given following the serial order. Corresponding to each number, the original Sanskrit text with appropriate reference is given in transliteration in the appendix to the work. Even in the body of the exposition all Sanskrit expressions are in transliteration. The transliteration marks follow those that are adopted by the 'History of Philosophy, Eastern and Western' sponsored by the Ministry of Education, Government of India.

* Jīvanmukta is the name given to a man purified by knowledge of Brahman and exonerated whilst living from future birth and all ritual ceremonies.

With a view to demonstrating the Śruti-basis of the Avadhūta-Gītā the translation of each verse of the first two chapters is followed by a specific Upanisadic text or texts presenting a similar idea.

The translation of the Sanskrit texts throughout is governed by the spirit and sense of each text.

In a few contexts some Sanskrit texts are repeated. But the purpose they serve in each instance is different.

These chapters which artificially divide the book into different sections are not intended to segment the object of our study, Dattātreyā. In fact Dattātreyā is the integrated vision of a seamless Reality, the ever-holy, the all-pervasive Reality vouchsafed to us by Him as the philosopher, avadhūta, who takes us under His protecting wings as Īśvara, the Lord of all

'I offer my salutations to the Supreme Power, the Highest Reality, the Real, that which is devoid of a beginning, a middle and an end, the prop of the whole universe, Itself needing no prop, the support of all the worlds, the changeless, the ocean of infinite bliss and knowledge, the most marvellous Being, the lord of ambikā, the mother of all that exists and that than which there is nothing more supreme.'⁽¹⁾

'May He protect us alike.

May He cherish our endeavour to learn alike.

May we strive together with vigour.

May our study become illumined.

Let us not hate each other.'⁽²⁾

Aum. Peace Peace Peace.

My words are poised on my mind and my mind has its support in speech (along with the other senses). O, the Radiant one! Irradiate my mind. O speech and mind of mine! May you have the power of bringing (unto me) the (knowledge of the) Scripture (Veda), (O mind!) Do not waft away from me what has been heard by me from my preceptor. (O Brahman!) By knowledge thus garnered, I meditate on Thee by day and night I shall ever speak of what is fitting. I shall ever speak of what is true. May that (Brahman) protect the speaker. May that protect me, May that protect the speaker. aum! peace, peace, peace ⁽³⁾

CHAPTER I

THE DIVINE IN MAN (ĪŚVARĀNUGRAHA)

I. THE URGE FOR PHILOSOPHY

'Knowledge of undifferentiated unity springs in the inspired men only by grace of God and saves them from great peril' ⁽⁴⁾

THIS is the opening passage of the Avadhūta-Gītā by Śrī Dattātreyā whom the Upanisads state to be the supreme Lord of the Universe. It forms one of the passages of my daily prayer handed down through tradition. Every time I recite it, it kindles deep reflection in my mind. My constant dwelling on these words drew my mind into the deeper significance of the expressions it contained. Though these expressions, verbally speaking, are familiar to us, the doubts that crossed my mind and the questions I was compelled to ask myself could not be satisfied by the usual meanings given to these terms. The conventional meanings of these terms conflicted with those which belonged to an ancient heritage of which the seers or ṛsis, who shaped the very fundamentals of the culture, were the custodians. This was the message of Dattātreyā to the world, and it led me seriously to consider what meaning this declaration had in relation to actual experience of life. What is life? What is death? What is it that we really fear (mahābhaya), life or death? Who are those fortunate beings that are regarded as endowed with illumination? How are they fortunate? Are they fortunate because of birth or because of the grace of the Lord? What is the grace of the Lord? Is it something that is given to man or does he achieve it by his own efforts? What is God, Īśvara? Is it God in the ordinary sense in which it is understood in the world? Is it the truth or reality, the ultimate principle of all? These and various other serious doubts assailed me until one day through a chance experience I was able to gain some insight into the meanings of these memorable words. One day the truth flashed across my mind. So many things cleared up. I recalled to mind the celebrated reference of Vasistha in his Yoga-Vāsiṣṭha-Rāmāyana (Vol. 3-7) where he says that 'the truth flashed past one—like lightning—in between the gaps created by the absence of thought.' Indeed, it was an illumination, difficult to explain. Therefore I attempted to co-ordinate all this into a meaningful experience. That is how Dattātreyā became to me the torch-bearer of a new meaning and purpose of life. His tremendous spiritual importance began to grip my imagination more and more until he became for me the visible form of the highest truth defined as 'Real, Knowledge, Infinite is Brahman', 'satyam jñānam anantam brahma (Tait. Up.) 'One only, secondless is Brahman', ekamevādvitīyam brahma (Ch. Up. 6) in the Vedas.

Illumination is the gift of God, Īśvara (the Ruler of the Universe). It comes to those who strive hard to understand the mystery of being. What drives man into higher realms of existence is the urge to know the essence of our being.

There is an urge in all of us which cannot quite be satisfied without an attempt being made to realise the truth relative to our being. It is the urge—the urge of self-realisation: to love and adore something higher than ourselves which we recognise and know to be holy but about which we can never fully express ourselves effectively. We are told in the Taittirīya-Upaniṣad that words with mind fall back baffled from truth without touching it—yato vāco nīvarante aprāpya manasā saha. A clear recognition of this urge is the heritage that has been handed down to us by our forefathers, the men of vision and wisdom.

The Self underlying all existence is the object of realisation. Our seers call this absolute reality, satya, in the light of the Upaniṣadic teaching; taṁ satyam (Ch. Up. 6). Their exposition of the truth is called Śruti and Smṛti. Śruti is the basis of Smṛti. To a superficial reader, Śruti appears to present divergent views about reality. But throughout the history of Indian thought there is a persistent effort to find out the unity of thought in Śruti. This finally resulted in the formulation of the Vedānta-Sūtra by Bādarāyaṇa in which we are told that the whole field of Śruti and Smṛti has but one single subject signified as Brahman or Ātman.

The Upaniṣads characterise this truth as non-dual, advaita. The Māṇḍūkya-Upaniṣad defines this truth as Ātman and characterises it as peaceful, holy and non-dual, śāntam, śivam, advaitam. For one who has grasped and intuited Brahman as non-dual, advaita, there is nought else than that state of non-duality. The urge for this realisation is innate in every individual. It is a sign of the grace of God, Īśvarānugraha. Its expression or operation makes one a 'man of wisdom', a man of illumination, a 'vipra'.

An attempt is made in the present work to show the meaning of non-duality or identity, advaita, in the light of Vedic teaching. Though in the course of later Vedāntic discussions the concept of non-duality is sharply distinguished from the concepts of identity, unity and so on, these concepts are made use of in the Vedas indistinguishably. These terms are therefore used in the present work synonymously. In this connection I concentrate on the concept of Dattātreyā as it is handed down through the Upanisadic tradition. As it will be made clear in the following pages, Dattātreyā is no other than Brahman, Ātman, Īśvara or Advaita. Of these several concepts, identity, advaita, gives us an approach to reality, that is, Dattātreyā.

The doctrine of non-duality, advaita, handed down from very early times in the Vedic and Upanisadic ages, had been systematically developed by many philosophers and seers until it was made into a terse, living metaphysical system by Śaṅkarācārya and his followers. Even before Śaṅkarācārya, advaita (identity), had its niche cut out for it in Indian philosophical thought, by the vast work on the subject known as Vāsiṣṭha-Rāmāyaṇa. This large and voluminous work is a veritable compendium of the philosophy of advaita (identity). The apparent unity of all things is a theme continuously expounded and dwelt upon by the sage Vasiṣṭha in his discourse to his discerning and enquiring pupil, Śrī Rāma. So this idea of unity advaita (identity) was not alien to Hindu thought. Therefore it is but natural that in every human being who is blessed with a keen faculty of thought there is the latent urge to turn towards the ideal of finding for himself, non-duality or that complete identity with the unity of all things, called advaita. It is the realisation of the 'I-ness', the 'one-ness' of all beings. It is of this unity or 'I-ness' that Śaṅkara sings:

'Man caught in the vortex of unreality looks on the universe awake or asleep, under relations of cause and effect, master and servant, teacher and pupil, parent and child. My obeisance to Dakṣiṇāmūrti, the teacher incarnate of this truth.'⁽⁶⁾

In this passage the word māyā is usually taken to mean illusion. But this word gives different meanings in different contexts. In this work also the meaning of the word is governed by the context.

The realisation of the unity of Reality can come to very few, to the fortunate few, who have renounced all desires and are the recipients of divine grace, Īśvarāṅgraha. The Tripurā-Rahasya says:—‘Not all the learned, however expert, see the truth of this. They have no inward vision. Consequently they are deluded and wander away. As long as vision will not cease to be extravert, so long will the inner eye remain unopened. The inward vision dawns on those only who have abandoned all cupidity. How could it dawn on one who clings to craving for things? Abandon then all low desires and fix thy eye on the Real. Wander not in mind, and in utter concentration seek the truth. Meditation reveals all to you. Transcendent truth becomes realized. By truth one attains immortality.’⁽⁶⁾

This is the realisation of one’s own essence, ‘sva-svarūpa’ as the Devī Tripurā calls it in the work mentioned above, and in Śaṅkarācārya’s words it is the ‘I-ness’. This ‘I-ness’ in all things can be of many relationships, such as effect and cause, father and son, master and servant, teacher and the taught, nescience and illusion and seeing and realising. If we really look at the process of evolution it becomes possible to realise that amongst the many varied and variegated things in existence, animal life, plant life and even minerals, there is behind all this vast manyness a single cogent factor which like the string that binds the necklace of pearls, is ever present in all aspects of life. In fact we arrive at the conclusion that the whole world exhibits the effects of the outlooks of all the beings who are in it.

The Hindu belief is that any being who does not try to realise himself and fails to gain release from ignorance, avidyā or māyāvaraṇa, or the envelope of Māyā, is destined to be reborn again and again until he finally, in some birth, attains release, mokṣa; and it is an accepted fact that each man has within himself a latent spark which would enable him to realise the supreme goal of life, that is, mokṣa—complete freedom from bondage · complete enjoyment of spiritual bliss: oneness or union with Brahman. The important thing, however, is the message that everyone should try and make the best of what one can do in this life-time alone. As Śaṅkara has said in his commentary on the Īśāvāsya-Upaniṣad, ‘one should not commit suicide, ātmahanana by not realising one’s true innermost self, the Ātman.’

The truth of identity might be explained in another way. A rope is mistaken for a snake. The man in whose mind the impression of a snake is created, though in reality it is only a rope, believes in it, so that it appears to be really a snake. But if he were to persist in looking at it discriminatingly and long enough, he will realise that what he had mistaken for a snake is none other than a piece of rope. Similarly it might be said that the world of appearances is like the snake superimposed on the rope. If through proper discrimination we can see the rope and not the snake, so too we can similarly look at the world and be in a position to realise that the world as reality is quite different from the world of appearances, as different as the rope is from the appearance of the snake. The superimposition of the snake on the rope is called illusion or nescience, avidyā or māyā. The removal of illusion or nescience, avidyā or māyā, reveals the truth. That truth is expressed in the Vedic statement—'There is no distinction in It', neha nānāsti kimcana, without which the world cannot exist.

Actually, nescience, māyā or illusion, avidyā, is not the opposite of knowledge, jñāna. In fact it is only a state of super-imposition and after its removal there emerges reality. The Vedānta has a simile for the truth. It says, we can dream of a snake, and in the dream the snake can bite us, which wakes us out of the dream. Therefore māyā is like the unreal snake that can bite us out of the dream (svapna) into the waking state (jāgrat). Even Vedānta, says the Mānasollāsa, 'though in itself false, can be a means for us to be awakened to the reality like a picture'. A picture on the wall depicting a scene is partially true and partially false. So is it with māyā (nescience). It is not unreal, nor is it real. There is no opposition between māyā and jñāna—but it is only a comparison. Māyā is the mirror which reflects the image, and not the image itself—viśvam darpana dṛśyamānanagarītulyam. (Śankara's Dakṣiṇāmūrti-Stotra—2)

As the Mānasollāsa by Sureśvarācārya says, the Vedānta is only a means to awaken within us the reality. It is a means to an end, and the 'I-ness' or the attitude of non-duality, advaita-bhāvanā, is actually the supreme experience which can never be successfully described except to indicate with similes in a general manner what the ultimate truth of ultimate reality is.

The experience of non-duality, advaita-anubhava, comes through the grace of God, Īśvara, which as the spiritual guide, guru, is responsible for the initiation of the disciple into the highest knowledge. We are in fact told in the Purāṇas that the Lord, Īśvara, commanded Brahmā to create creatures who would be mortal while he would take the form of the illumined one, guru, and would come into the world to bless his disciples with the illumination of the understanding of the state of non-duality—with the attitude of the highest identity, paramādvaita-bhāvanā. He would continue to make all the disciples immortal through His grace—guru-kaṭākṣa and He would for ever leave in the world the secret of the realisation of identity, advaita-jñāna, this science of Brahman, or Brahmavidyā. It was from Dakṣiṇāmūrti that it was handed down to the various disciples of his tradition (gurusampradāya) who would carry it on for ever, like the ever flowing river of knowledge, the river of the sacred flow of the Gaṅgā, the tradition of the illumined one gurusampradāya-pravāha.

God, Īśvara is also one who of his own will can work miracles and wonders. He is the master magician of the world. Nescience, māyā, is the illusion that he creates and those who do not take refuge in It and seek It as their shelter will be at a loss and at their wit's end.

Tripurā Rahasya says:—

‘This world of spirit and matter is similar to the image of a city found in a mirror. Being the same in form it cannot be fancied that one is superior or inferior to the other. Apartness in essence is a fiction and so an unimportant notion. Hence a man of wisdom ought to meditate on the impartite form of the Highest. One who is not competent to do this may meditate on the more tangible form which one can well conceive and understand. Even thus will he, if unattached, attain to a good unsurpassed. Even if it takes crores of lives to attain, no way better than this has been conceived to reach the truth.’⁽⁷⁾

The same truth is expounded in the Madhu-prakarana in the Bṛhad-āraṇyaka-Upaniṣad where Maitreyī asks Yājñavalkya how one could become immortal. Yājñavalkya replies: ‘Not for the sake of the husband, but for the sake of the spirit does a husband become dear. So it is with wife, sons, property, worlds, gods, scripture, natural elements and all. So the Self is to be seen, heard, thought about and meditated upon.’⁽⁸⁾ He who regards any of these things as other than the self is thereby shut out from the truth.

Non-duality or Advaita is called the highest truth, paramārtha in the Viṣṇupurāṇa. It says: ‘The Absolute is non-differentiated. For it is said that the highest self, Ātman, which is the same as the highest truth, though it appears as the many, is in reality one only and it is the witness of all and it is ever present. It is uniformly spread out and being witness of all is not bound by actions. It is beyond

Whence did you come and whither are you going? Because "I am neither the one that goes nor the one that comes. I am not one who is fixed to a place. You are also the same. The others also are the same. You are not yourself. Nor are the others themselves. Even I am not myself."⁽¹⁰⁾ The reason why I asked you for fine food, mṛṣṭānna, was to see whether your reply would pertain to the mode of one who had realised the truth of the self, ātma-tattva. To a man who eats there is in reality no difference in food, whether good or bad. We eat because we want to live by taking in such particles of food to supplement what already is in the body, just as we plaster mud on a mud-house in order to keep it intact. Since food is part of the earth principle and necessary for the body, it is consumed. Having understood this, keep yourself in perfect poise—equanimity—samāvasthā.' Thus answering Nidāgha's questions Ṛbhu reveals himself as his teacher, guru, and tells him the truth: 'Know this to be one only. The whole universe admits of no difference. It forms the nature of the supreme self, Ātman, which is known as Vāsudeva.'⁽¹¹⁾

The story goes on to say that after the lapse of years Ṛbhu visited Nidāgha again. Ṛbhu asked Nidāgha: 'Why are you standing apart from others?' Nidāgha replied to him that the Ruler of the town was coming in procession on an elephant. He said that the Ruler was on the elephant and all the others were his followers. Ṛbhu asks: 'Show me both elephant and king—which is the elephant and which is the king? What are their characteristics?' Nidāgha answers: 'The lower is the elephant and the upper the king. The elephant is the vehicle and the king the rider. Who cannot understand this?' Ṛbhu questions again: 'What is below and what is above?' So Nidāgha climbed on the shoulders of Ṛbhu and said: 'You are the elephant and I am the king. You are below and I am above. I have done so to make you understand.' Ṛbhu replied: 'You are like the king and I am like the elephant. Therefore what art thou and what am I? Tell me that?' When he heard this statement, Nidāgha knew it was his teacher Ṛbhu and prostrated himself at his feet saying: 'No one else has the same pure outlook of identity, advaita-bhāvanā as you my teacher, (guru), and I realised at once from your questioning that it was you and no one else.' Ṛbhu in reply said: 'out of compassion for you I have already expounded to you the truth of identity, advaita-tattva, that you may learn it without doubt.' So saying he went away. Nidāgha had the realisation of Truth as Viṣṇupurāṇa says. It concludes the story thus: 'This twice-born Nidāgha saw all the creatures be identical with his self. He became thus devoted to Brahman and obtained the highest liberation.

In the same manner O! the knower of Truth, dharma, you also must be one to whom the self, the enemy and the relative are the same. O Lord of the Earth, you must know that Ātman is all-meeting.

Even as space, though it is one, is seen as being white, blue and so on, by those whose vision is vitiated by illusion, though Ātman is one, it is made many.

What exists in the world is one. It is imperishable, acyuta. There is nothing beyond that. I am He. The other person is He. You are He. This is He. This identity is the essence of Self, Ātman. Abandon delusion of difference.^{'(12)}

Each is therefore a part of the infinite—the All. In the world what sustains us also helps us, as the ground which offers resistance to our feet is necessary for walking. There is no escape from the Self. Even ignorance, māyā, belongs to it and it is not devoid of truth. Knowledge is one. The highest knowledge is identity, advaita, beyond which is naught else. Knowing one is knowing all, like a musician who knows his notes and a piece of music knows all pieces of music through the idea of notes. We may go and find the self, as many thousands are said to have done. From the unreal to the real is not going from one thing to another, but from the complexity of duality and multiplicity to the simplicity of unity. From death to immortality is the same, error is a matter not merely of thought, but of action and conation and thus of involvement in a false condition, from which knowledge is the only release.

When Śuka and the other sages approached Dakṣināmūrti with doubts in their minds, the Lord expounded to them the truth of identity, advaita-tattva and the attitude of identity, advaita-bhāva. As has Dattātreya said in his Avadhūta-Gītā:—

'That by which all this is filled and that which pervades the self—How am I to offer my salutations to that formless, undifferentiated and inexhaustible Holy one?'⁽¹³⁾

The Yoga-Vāsiṣṭha also comes to the same conclusion:—

'It is indeed possible to attain to (this knowledge) which is fully expounded herein. If you listen to it which is śāstra, (science of Brahman in the real sense) attentively, then you will understand the truth and not otherwise. The conviction that the objects of the senses are non-existent leads to the removal of their impressions from the highest truth Through this grace, through the gift of understanding, the great wisdom comes—man's immense opportunity to ascend to the highest plane of being: the supreme 'I', 'Brahman I am', 'brahmāham'.

2. THE PHILOSOPHIC VISION (PRATIBHĀ)

How does this identity, the Grace of the Lord, advaita-īśvarānugraha come? It comes by the practice of discipline, yoga. Through it the development of the individual illumination, pratibhāśakti occurs. Through discipline, yoga, all spiritual success is attained. When Patañjali maharsi makes the momentous statement in his Yoga-Sūtra (II-33), 'From the philosophic vision also (the aspirant, yogin) knows all else', prātibhād-vā-sarvaṃ, he means that by yogic concentration the intellect can be developed to its perfection. He points out that illumination, pratibhā, is that part of the intellect which develops without any special cause and is able to lead on to real knowledge. It is intuition from within, the divine spark which suddenly illumines darkness into light. It is that which gives through God's or Īsvara's grace the realisation of identity, advaitānubhava. The development of illumination, pratibhā which is the gift of the divine is due to a man's latent disposition, samskāra, which suddenly ripens through divine grace. It is extremely difficult to explain the concept of disposition, samskāra, but there is no doubt that it relates to experience. For those who have experienced it, it is a very live force capable of tremendous possibilities. We speak of men who have received divine illumination, pratibhā-śālins, who have through the maturing of their latent possibilities, samskāras, radiated illumination and understanding in a world of darkness, māyā. They radiate their special genius, pratibhā, for the benefit of mankind. They then become pioneers of freedom or independence, svatantra-kartas. They are the men who through a flash of illumination intuit the grand truth, the great unity within diversity, the advaita-paramārtha.

Whitehead speaks of religion as what man does with his solitariness. If we look deeply into that statement we can see the real significance of Whitehead's remark. For, truly is religion what man does with his solitariness. Have not our ancient seers said that the highest truth was to realise that existence is one without a second, the complete unity of all in one? So too the man who realises his solitariness is one who realises the solitariness (one-ness) of the world.

Solitariness here need not mean loneliness or aloneness. It means oneness, the oneness of the self, Ātman everywhere. One who can thus find satisfaction with his solitariness is truly a fit soul for release from all earthly bonds by the attainment of non-duality, advaita.

Similarly William James speaking of the claims of the discipline called yoga, says in his Varieties of Religious Experience, that there is no reason to deny that in mystic experience the mystic comes in touch with a circumambient world from which saving experiences come. He refers specifically to the discipline of yoga. In the other places referred to he argues that there is evidence to think that there are levels of energy and power in man higher than are perceptible in ordinary experience. And man can by effort live at higher levels and tap sources of power normally considered impossible.

The technique of yoga is indeed a method by which release of such higher powers might be obtained in a systematic way available to the individual and verifiable by all who make the effort in the prescribed way. So can the nectar of identity, advaitāmṛta, be grasped and enjoyed by all.

Idealist philosophy from Plato onwards has believed in a way of knowing recognised as higher than discursive reason, which its expounders have called intellectual intuition. Plotinus, Spinoza, Hegel and Bradley have made it an integral part of their theory of knowledge. In the spiritual life of art, religion and philosophy, we contact reality in its fullness and harmony. Here knowing partakes of the character of being, subject and object become fused, as it were. The experience is called inspiration in art, vision of God in religion and unitive knowledge in philosophy.

Meditation, samādhi of the discipline of yoga, in which the self comes to true self-knowledge as well as knowledge of reality in its fullness, derives corroborative support from intuition. The idealist philosophy of religion attributes a revelation to such mystic experience on the part of the founders of religion.

More recently Bergson has referred to the discipline of yoga and its claims in his Two Sources of Morality and Religion. He applies his philosophy of creative evolution to religion in the book and finds in mystic experience at its best, nature's way of rising to a higher level of life. In man instinct is surrounded by an aura of intelligence which again is crowned with intuition. Mystics might be those individuals of the race who rise to a higher level through intuition. Morality arises from group pressure and is limited to group welfare in its action. Mysticism brings the experience of love as the core of life's meaning. Creative love is revealed as the essence of the universe. By example, society is imbued with the new morality of the mystics. Mystic experience therefore becomes a way of expressing the direction and meaning of evolution and so receives support from nature and science. Yoga, he observes, in this light will be the line of advance of creative evolution.

In his metaphysics, Bergson attaches great prominence to intuition as the method of philosophic thinking as contrasted with intelligence. Intelligence in its usual procedure in ordinary life and in science proceeds by analysis. Such analysis introduces static phases or points in a continually changing whole and places them side by side as in space for convenience of apprehension. Intellect therefore gives us static snapshots of changing realities. But philosophy is interested in knowing reality as it is. It must therefore seize reality on the wing, as it were. It must be a kind of sympathetic imagination placing itself in the heart of the reality sought, to be understood and to coincide with its rhythm.

It may be questioned whether the discipline of yoga through the meditation of different degrees of intensity called dhāraṇā, dhyāna and samādhi is one that leads us to the heart of reality or away from it. The procedure of suppressing the waves of mind, citta-vṛtti, seems to point to the negative way. But actually the result claimed, namely full knowledge, sarvajñatā, points to the results of the positive, unitive, intuitive way.

Also Jung's theory of the unconscious as the racial memory or potentiality charged with God implies that the mind is surrounded by an aura transcending the ordinary limits of sense perception. This line of thought supports the yoga hypothesis of aloofness, kaivalya, unity, advaita through intense meditation, samādhi.

Another point of contact between psycho-analysis and the discipline of yoga is the rôle of reason. Both depreciate reason in one sense, but use it to rise in another sense. Psycho-analysis depreciates reason as rationalisation or defence of unconscious or suppressed desires. But it uses reason in its analysis and in persuading the patient to discover the real source of his neurosis. This self-discovery is supposed to help the individual to overcome the influence of the suppressed emotions. In practising the discipline of yoga the thinking principle of the waves of the mind, citta-vṛtti, is sought to be suppressed altogether to attain concentration on one subject. But this concentration is not meant to penetrate the essence of the object but only to assist the rise of the mind to the higher level of intellect, buddhi. Depreciated in the process of suppression, reason is appreciated in the rôle of intellect, buddhi.

Dr. S. Radhakrishnan says in his Indian Philosophy (pp. 372-3), 'To the modern mind, in east or west the whole yoga scheme of attaining perfection appears to be only an elaborate process of self-hypnotisation. Intense and solitary meditations accompanied by physical exercises and postures, help to make our minds run into particular moulds. Such a view gains some support from the popular confusion of the yoga system with some of the repulsive practices of the tantra cult and later adaptations of Patañjali's Yoga by fanatical mendicants. It is, however, necessary to bear in mind the fact that Patañjali's Yoga, in its original form, is free from these vagaries. It assumes that we have all reservoirs of life to draw upon of which we do not dream. It formulates the methods of getting at our deeper functional levels. The yoga discipline is nothing more than the purification of the body, mind and soul and preparing them for the beatific vision. Since the life of man depends on the nature of the mind, citta, it is always within our reach to transform our nature by controlling our mind, citta. With faith and concentration we can even rid ourselves of our ills. The normal limits of human vision are not the limits of the universe. There are other worlds than that which our senses reveal to us, other senses than those which we share with the lower animals, other forces than those of material nature. If we have faith in the soul, then the supernatural is also a part of the natural. Most of us go through life with eyes half shut and with dull minds and heavy hearts, and even the few who have had those rare moments of vision and awakening fall back quickly into somnolence. It is good to know that the ancient thinkers required us to realise the possibilities of the soul in solitude and silence and transform the flashing and fading moments of vision into a steady light which could illuminate the long years of life.'

The reference to the views of modern philosophers shows that there is a great deal of force in the claims of our forbears for their belief in identity, advaita and the help it received from illumination, pratibhā. And that modern thought seems to support such a standpoint is quite evident from what has been briefly mentioned above. So it behoves us to study deeply and with faith and understanding the rich heritage that is our legacy from the past, thereby gaining liberation, moksa through identity, the highest truth, advaita-paramārtha and thus becoming men of divine illumination, pratibhāśālins. We then become men of 'impartial outlook', samadarśins, as a result of knowledge gained through true advaita-jñāna, knowledge of identity. The Bhagavad-Gītā defines the person who is thus qualified:—'In the case of that person who has conquered his self (lower) and has attained to the calm of self-mastery, his supreme self abides ever concentrated, and he is at peace whether be it in cold or heat, in pleasure or pain, in honour or dishonour.'⁽¹⁷⁾

'The ascetic, Yogi, whose soul is satisfied with wisdom and knowledge, who is unchanging and master of his senses, to whom a clod, a stone and a piece of gold are the same, is said to be controlled (in yoga).'⁽¹⁸⁾

'He who is equal-minded among friends, companions and foes, among those who are neutral and impartial, among those who are hateful and related, among saints and sinners, he excels.'⁽¹⁹⁾

For he who is thus poised in himself, sees all as equal, his own self, Ātman, in everything, is the one who is not only liberated, living in this very body, jīvanmukta, but also the philosopher of philosophers, avadhūta.

In answer to the queries with which we started our discussion, we may now note that identity, advaita, taught in our scriptures is rich in implication and is of practical value. The Śāṇḍilya-Upanisad brings out the character of this one subject of the śāstras by showing how as the source and aim of all, it is existence, knowledge and bliss, sat, cit and ānanda. It is Brahman because it is complete and makes all complete; it is Ātman because it has all, makes all and puts an end to all; it is maheśvara because it is the greatest of all and directs the greatest entities of the world. This great truth of the character of the illumination is of the nature of grace, anugraha, and it has been given as a gift to Atri and Anasūyā in the form of their son. For this reason it is called Dattātreyā. To know this truth of Dattātreyā is to be the knower of Brahman, brahmavid, jīvanmukta and avadhūta.

In the following pages an attempt is made to expound the concept of Dattātreyā in the light of the Upanisadic teaching, showing at the same time that he is the greatest teacher of liberation in this life, jīvanmukta, and the state of being a real philosopher, avadhūtatva, which offers the true meaning of life here and shows that it is all that exists.

In conclusion it may be stated that the grace of the Lord īṣvarāṇugraha, is the first step that leads one to that frame of mind wherein it is possible for him to experience the meaning of identity, advaita. And when his disposition, saṁskāra, matures, there develops within himself divine illumination, pratibha, through which the highest truth is intuited, leading to the state of liberation in life, jīvanmukti. He is the blessed one who through being a man of illumination, a pratibhā-śālin, radiates happiness and light.

I will only think of sweetness and will generate sweetness. The words that I speak shall be sweet and what I communicate to others shall be sweet. May I utter words which are sweet to the Gods and which men love to hear. May the Gods protect me by imparting to me the grace of speech (as occasion befits) and may my ancestors also assent to what I say.⁽²⁰⁾

Aum śāntiḥ śāntiḥ.

CHAPTER II

DATTĀTREYA: THE ABSOLUTE:

I. DATTĀTREYA: A SKETCH

WHAT a name to conjure with! Its splendence brings forth a splendour unimaginable, what miracles does it achieve for its devotees and what accomplishments, siddhis, it has showered on the faithful followers: truly those who have uttered that glorious name even once are indeed fortunate. Even in the age of kali, (kaliyuga) they are the truly liberated beings. To touch the lotus feet of even those devotees is punya or holy merit. There is nothing more fascinating than to contemplate the greatness of the incarnation, avatāra, of the supreme Lord as Dattātreyā.

The Śāṇḍilya-Upaniṣad which most beautifully describes Lord Dattātreyā sings:—

‘He who would meditate in accordance with the mode laid down in the Upaniṣad on the Deity Dattātreyā, the Lord of Lords, Dattātreyā the Lord, the gracious, śiva, the tranquil, śānta, the Lord who is lustrous like sapphire indranīla (in complexion) indranīlanibha, the mighty one, prabhu, delighting in His own marvellous power, māyā, investing Ātman, ātma-māyā-rata, the Lord whose activities are his sport, līlā, the Lord who is the one philosopher, avadhūta, the Lord who has the cardinal directions as his garments, digambara, the Lord whose entire limbs are smeared with holy ashes, bhasmoddhūlita-sarvāṅga, the Lord who wears the crown of matted hair, jaṭā-jūṭadhara, the glorious Lord, vibhu, the Lord four-armed, caturbāhu, and invested with distinguished limbs, udārāṅga, the Lord with eyes opened wide like full-blown lotus flowers, praphulla-kamalekṣana, the Lord who is the treasure-trove of knowledge, jñāna, and discipline, yoga, jñāna-yoga-nidhi, the Lord who is the world-teacher, viśvaguru, the Lord who is dear to the yogis, yogijanapriya, the Lord who is tender to his devotees, bhaktānukāmpin, the Lord who is the witness of all, sarvasāksin and the Lord who is served by accomplished adepts, siddhā-sevita, such a one, released from all sins will attain beatific bliss. Thus aum! the truth. Thus the Upaniṣad.”(11)

This meditation conjures up before our mind's eye a supernal vision ineffable and incommunicable in a woefully inadequate language. It is the vision of a splendid form on which the devotee sets his eyes and becomes ravished. It is the form that lures and fascinates the devotee's mind that becomes merged in it. The śloka (prayer) is replete with ideas each one of which needs to be elaborated upon in order that we may grasp the fullest significance and quint-essence which brings balm to man's afflicted soul.

II

'Dattātreyam'. Thus begins the meditation, dhyāna, of the Lord. What does the nomenclature of Dattātreyā mean? Why was he called Dattātreyā? The Śāṇḍilya-Upaniṣad says: 'Wherefore then is it known as Dattātreyā? For the reason that the resplendent lord, mightily pleased as he was, donated himself to Atri, Atri, who was engaged in the most arduous of penances and who wished for a son which he lacked and for the reason that Atri's son was born of Anasūyā; for these reasons it is known as Dattātreyā.'⁽²²⁾

Further, this name represents the partly divisible and partly indivisible form of Brahman: 'Then of that Lord whose own energy manifests itself in his creative play, who is filled with compassion towards his devotees, whose form is that of Dattātreyā, whose beautiful body is unconcealed with raiment, whose four arms resemble the petals of the lotus, and whose form is spotless in its purity and sinlessness, it is the divisible-indivisible form.'⁽²³⁾

The name of Dattātreyā is the boat, tāraka, that enables a devotee to cross the ocean of life with success. Brahmā the creator is informed by Lord Nārāyaṇa (himself Dattātreyā) that one who meditates thus: 'I am the Datta, i.e., Dattātreyā', 'dattoham' (the great Lord who has given unto his devotees the sentience of the peerless Brahman, as the means to be employed for the attainment of the state of the non-differentiated Brahman) does not have to go through the vortex of worldly existence. There are several mystic formulae of the same Dattātreyā which enable a devotee to attain to all that his heart may devoutly wish of terrestrial and celestial happiness. It may be mentioned in passing that the conception, 'I am Datta, i.e., Dattātreyā', dattoham, like 'Śiva I am', śivoham and 'He I am', soham, implies the complete unity of the individual (jīva) and the supreme, (Īśvara) or the realisation of the 'I-ness' as being the fusion of goodness and energy, śiva-śakti-aikya. That alone is the highest knowledge, juāna, the absolute identity, paramādvaita or the highest unitive experience.

III

The next name signifies Dattātreyā as Śiva, 'śivam'. Śiva means the most Auspicious one. As Śiva, Dattātreyā is the most auspicious. This signifies that without his grace nothing else can be attained. For this reason he is in daily prayer generally described as the Lord of the World, jagannātha, and the one whose grace is the world's blessing, lokānugraha-kāraṇa.

The great Lord, in the intensity of thought wished 'may I become many, may I bring forth the progeny'. Afterwards from Him who was performing penance three letters came into being (These three letters are a, u, m and they constitute the pranava, aum). Three vyāhrtis (mystical exclamations) (bhūh, bhuvah, svah), gāyatrī consisting of three steps (tātsavituh varenyam; bhargo devasya dhīmahi; dhīyo yo nah pracodayāt), three Vedas (R̥k, Yajus and Sāma), the three gods (brahmā, viṣṇu and maheśvara), the three orders of society, varnas (brahma, ksatra and vaiśya) and the three sacrificial fires (gārhaspatya, āhavanīya and dakṣināgni) came into existence. He, this great God Maheśvara, who is abounding with abundance, in the full plenitude of his powers, who pervades all and is seated in the heart of all beings, the great wizard sports with his wonder-working power, māyā. He is brahmā. He is viṣṇu. He is indra. He is all gods and all creatures. He is indeed the front, the east. He is indeed the back, the west. He is indeed the north. He is indeed the south. He is indeed the below. He is indeed the above. He is indeed all. Dattātreyā is the form of this God visible.'⁽²⁴⁾

So the great Lord Maheśvara, while playing with his own creative power assumed the form of Dattātreyā. This passage aims at explaining the fact of complete identity of Dattātreyā and Maheśvara. The attribute śiva, as applied to Dattātreyā brings out this character well. Śiva, the primordial being, is Maheśvara himself. Maheśvara in his manifold sports, līlas, became Dattātreyā. So Śiva is Dattātreyā and Dattātreyā is Śiva.

In continuation of this thought the same Upanisad concludes: 'Hence the name Dattātreyā by which it is called. Further one who understands the meaning of this word (Dattātreyā) thus becomes one who understands all. Further one who indeed by means of knowledge, cogitation, meditates upon him (Dattātreyā), the highest God as 'I am he' becomes the knower of Brahman.'⁽²⁵⁾ This passage evidently presupposes complete identity of Brahman, Śiva, Maheśvara and Dattātreyā. If the truth were otherwise how can the knower of Dattātreyā be the knower of Brahman? Maheśvara himself is Dattātreyā. Dattātreyā is Brahman, Maheśvara is Brahman. Śiva as applied to Dattātreyā brings out the character of this identity.

It may be noted in this connection that the seer or spiritual preceptor of the sacred mantra or syllables, ṛṣi, in all the hymns, mantras, pertaining to Dattātreyā is Sadāśiva. This is an interesting fact. The Dattātreyā-Upaniṣad repeatedly mentions 'Sadāśiva is the seer, Dattātreyā is the subject matter i.e., the object of meditation.', sadāśiva ṛṣiḥ dattātreyo devatā. The same idea is further illustrated by a hymn, mantra, pertaining to Dattātreyā. It begins with salutations to Dattātreyā⁽²⁶⁾ and concludes with salutations to Śiva⁽²⁷⁾. Śiva in this connection is sadāśiva himself. Salutation to Dattātreyā is salutation to Śiva i.e., sadāśiva, the ever Holy. Hence Dattātreyā is no other than sadāśiva.

The character of this identity is further brought out by studying an earlier passage of the Upaniṣad where it is said 'Nārāyaṇa himself is Dattātreyā'⁽²⁸⁾. The same idea is further illustrated as 'Brahmā requested Nārāyaṇa "who is the boat (that helps us in crossing the ocean of bondage or life in the womb)." ' 'Tell me that O revered sir!' Requested in this manner, (nārāyaṇa) said: 'Meditate on my essence which is pure and which is the same as truth, satya, bliss, ānanda, and knowledge, cit, as "I am in all circumstances Datta, i.e., Dattātreyā himself" If you meditate on nārāyaṇa as Dattātreyā the same (nārāyaṇa) becomes the boat. This truth alone ought to be understood. It is the boat that takes one across the ocean of (bondage) birth and death, worry, etc.'⁽²⁹⁾.

This explains how Dattātreyā who is śiva, sadāśiva, or maheśvara is nārāyaṇa himself. This is the identity of God-head in one supreme principle. It is not a mechanical process of the conception of identity. It is attained to by the process of meditation, dhyāna, application, upāsana and understanding, viññāna. This is how maheśvara is revealed as the All-God, because he is the God of Gods. This is why he is brahmā, viṣṇu, rudra and so on. This unity, this identity of God-head is the highest truth that can ever be conceived. This truth is Brahman. The Upaniṣad brings out this truth in the meaning it gives to the name of Dattātreyā. The manner in which maheśvara takes the form of Dattātreyā is an illustration of the highest truth manifesting itself as Dattātreyā and of the complete identity of God-head thus achieved. It is not the identity that ignores or negates the world. It is indeed the identity that recognises all that exists. It is in this sense that the identity of the individual self, jīva and the universal self, Brahman is established.

The realisation of this identity as well as its process is itself divine. It is itself the truth of maheśvara. This is beautifully illustrated in the Śiva-Rahasya, the truth of śiva. It stands for complete identity of all, advaita. To master it is to realise it. To realise it is to be the truth itself. This is how Dattātreyā is maheśvara and maheśvara is Dattātreyā. To meditate on this truth, to lead the life of it and thus to understand it is the most auspicious thing. This is the truth of Dattātreyā being śiva.

IV

The next attribute is 'śāntam', 'the tranquil'. This means that Dattātreyā who is auspicious, śiva, is tranquil, śānta. The word tranquil, śānta, brings out his disposition. His disposition is one of peace, peace within and peace without. Peace is that great quality of that which is auspicious, śiva and also of one who has through deep contemplation of the form 'That (para-brahman) am I', sohambhāva, attained identity with the auspicious, śiva. He is therefore of peaceable or peace-loving disposition. He is auspicious, śiva. He is tranquil, śānta. The Upaniṣad presents him as auspicious and tranquil, śivam śāntam.

Further, the usual form of prayer to śiva is: 'Perfectly tranquil and seated in the posture of lotus seat, and wearing the moon itself as the diadem. . . .' The attribute 'wearing the moon itself as the diadem', śaśidhara makes it clear that the subject of prayer is śiva himself⁽³⁰⁾. Śaśidhara is the usual appellation of śiva.

Similarly, the usual form of prayer to viṣṇu is: 'Perfectly tranquil, and reposing on the serpent couch, with the stalk of the lotus sprouting from his lotus-shaped navel, the God of Gods. . . .' and so on⁽³¹⁾. The attribute of having the lotus-like navel, padmanābham makes it clear that the subject of this prayer is viṣṇu. Here again the quality of perfect tranquillity is applicable to both śiva and viṣṇu.

VI

Dattātreya is all-powerful, prabhu. He is really the master of the universe. Ordinarily the word master is used to mean a leader or ruler. But the Upaniṣadic sense of the sanskrit word prabhu is totally different.

The Śarabha-Upaniṣad says: 'Him who is the master, the highest of those that are attainable, the father, the highest God who created brahmā and taught him all the Vedas, the foremost, i.e., the first of all, (him) indeed who is the master, the father of all Gods' (36)

The present hymn which presents Dattātreya attributes all these qualities to him and for this reason he is called the 'all-powerful', prabhu. The whole idea presented by the 'all-powerful', prabhu who resides in all like a light, gyoti, becomes an illustration of how of all things in the world he alone is pleasing. He is pleasing because he is the giver of knowledge by giving Veda, the only source of knowledge. This is how he is the saviour of mankind. This illustrates the significance of such expressions as 'one who resembles the gem called indra-nīla', and 'Respect to him who is blue in colour, who is along with Lakṣmī, the goddess of wealth and who is known as Lord viṣṇu the great', as well as 'That is the highest essence of viṣṇu which the men of wisdom realise without fail.' (37) Passages like these support the same conclusion.

Attributing a body does not necessarily limit the 'limitless'. It only helps the devotee to glimpse something which can never be grasped otherwise. Therefore a reference to modern ideas may be of some use. It is thought by modern scholars that to attribute body to God is theism (the theory that God is a person). They hold that this modifies the absolute character of God-head. But the Upaniṣadic view is different. According to it, to attribute a body to God is to recognise his omnipotence. Further by attributing a body to God, he is brought within the grasp of our mind more easily than when he is described in terms beyond comprehension. This character is brought out by 'the all-powerful', prabhu and 'one who resembles the gem called indra-nīla', indranīla-prabha.

VII

Dattātreya is 'intent on the unravelling of power, māyā, investing Ātman', ātma-māyā-rata. This attribute presents the idea that Dattātreyā is intent on unravelling the power, māyā, enveloping the self, Ātman. Power, māyā, is a very complex concept. Commonly the Sanskrit word māyā means something unreal. The Upaniṣadic use gives māyā a meaning slightly different from that in daily use. With a view to understanding this, certain Upaniṣadic passages may be studied.

Nṛsiṃhottaratāpāny-Upaniṣad says: 'Itself being perfect and one it creates the illusion of it being the other. Having thus shown things to be separate from itself it itself becomes transformed into illusion and nescience. This is wonderful indeed. It shines of its own spiritual light.'⁽³⁸⁾ The passage explains how māyā is no other than the creative power of nṛsiṃha i.e., Dattātreyā in view of the present hymn.

Sarvasāra-Upaniṣad adds: 'What is called Māyā has no beginning nor an end. It is both real and unreal. It envelopes all. It can be said neither to exist nor not to exist. It is neither existence nor non-existence. Itself predominant, it is not subject to modification nor is it capable of being differentiated from other things. It can just be indicated but is incapable of being described by any other differentiating characteristic. This is termed Māyā.'⁽³⁹⁾

It can thus be seen that māyā forms in no sense a second to the highest truth. On the other hand, Dattātreyā, the highest truth, is the master of Māyā. The same idea is brought out by Triṣādvibhūti-mahā nārāyaṇa Upaniṣad: 'God, Īśvara, is the master of power, māyā, and hence of all learning, vidyā or true knowledge.'⁽⁴⁰⁾ Veda says 'The Lord of all sciences, vidyās. The Lord of all creatures. The Lord of Veda. The Lord of brahmā. May Brahman the auspicious protect me. The all auspicious aum.'⁽⁴¹⁾

'Being intent on the unravelling of power investing ātman' ātma-māyā-rata as applied to Dattātreyā elucidates his independent character. Māyā is power. He does not depend on other's power, but on his own power. The greatness of this power is such that it admits of no power other than itself, because all other powers are only its creation, i.e. they are the outcome of itself like the yogic accomplishments yoṃśiddhis, aṇimā, mahimā, garimā, laghimā, prāṇṇṇīh, prākāmyam, īśitvam and vaśitvam, as distinguished in the Upaniṣads.

All things, good, bad and indifferent are only different items of the operation of power. Yājñavalkya-Upaniṣad says: 'This power, māyā, is of three aspects, illumination, activity and delusion.'⁽⁴²⁾ This brings out clearly the comprehensiveness of the concept of power, māyā. It is the sole means of bondage.

Vārāha-Upaniṣad says: 'The same power, māyā, that invests the self before and is discarded at the end is that which is well expounded by those that uphold Brahman. If this is identified as power by means of discrimination, if there is the disappearance of power with its operation, there is then neither īśvarahood nor jīvahood. Finally "I" is nothing but pure spirit of consciousness.'⁽⁴³⁾ All these ideas signify that Dattātreyā who is meditated upon as 'one who is intent on unravelling of power investing ātman, ātma-māyā-rata is the author of both bondage and liberation by means of his own power. Rata implies that his whole activity in either way, whether he creates bondage or liberation, in his sport, līlā, which is the overflow of his beatific bliss, ānanda. In all circumstances he is ever the same with or without power, māyā. He is the truth of identity expressed as 'That am I' śoḥam. He is pure consciousness, cit, as is illustrated in such passages as, 'May we understand and realise the truth which is consciousness, caitanya, itself being of the nature of knowledge, the source of all. May it direct our intellect.'⁽⁴⁴⁾ Therefore, he is described as that which is wrapped in consciousness, and it is therefore called cidanibara in Sanskrit.

VIII

Dattātreyā is 'the Lord whose activities are in sport', deva. Mantrika-Upaniṣad introduces the concept of deva as: 'The God in whom all things disappear, and having disappeared become latent: further, they again and again see the state of being patent, and take their birth like bubbles. the God which is one is the essence of the self in the body with the individual soul and is present throughout the operation of different causes: It is He that is God. He is almighty. Again and again, unceasingly, those others realise him as the Lord whose activities are his sport, deva. They identify Him as Brahman, nothing but Brahman. Those who know this truth are those that are devoted to Brahman, brāhmanas. They enter into Him. They disappear in Him and become dissolved into Him (become of Him or merge Him and in Him or become of His essence). They indeed disappear and become latent. They indeed disappear in Him and become latent.'⁽⁴⁵⁾

Dakṣiṇāmūrti-Upaniṣad defines the concept of the Lord whose activities are his sport, deva, thus: 'He is the Lord whose activities are his sport, deva, who at the time of dissolution of all, having made all disappear in himself, enjoys his own spiritual bliss or shines forth in the same manner.'⁽⁴⁶⁾ The definition supplements the previous idea. From this it follows that all the divine activities mentioned by the previous passage are only the expressions of the spiritual bliss of the Lord whose activities are his sport, deva. Dissolution does not mean the cessation of his nature. His nature is bliss itself, svātmānanda. It is ever there, dissolution or no dissolution. It is unaffected. Creation or destruction does not increase or decrease the essence. It (the essence) is in the form of the Lord whose activities are his sport, deva. It is always the same throughout. It is the light that ever shines forth. (The root div means both sport and shining). It lives in all and shines forth in all. It is therefore called vāsudeva. (It is vāsudeva because as the shining principle of all it lives in all). The attribute 'The Lord whose activities are his sport', deva, as applied to Dattātreyā illustrates how he is vāsudeva, the absolute principle that shines in all.

IX

Dattātreyā is the philosopher, avadhūta. Nirālamba-Upaniṣad defines avadhūta thus: 'The avadhūta is one well versed in the teachings of Śruti and Smṛti and has his mind fixed in Brahman. By realising the truth of the meaning of the great statements of Śruti, 'Thou art that', 'I am Brahman', 'All this is Brahman', 'There is absolutely no duality in this (Brahman)', and so on, and having the conviction that I am nothing but Brahman itself, by means of meditation which admits of no duality, vikalpa, the person who has self-control and leads the life of his own determination becomes an ascetic. He is the ascetic. He is the liberated. He is the revered. He is the aspirant. He is the highest of the ascetics. He is the philosopher, avadhūta. He is the person who is devoted to Brahman. This is the conclusion.'⁽⁴⁷⁾

Māṇḍala Brāhmaṇa-Upaniṣad says: 'In the manner defined so far, that sage, sanyāsi, who has solely engaged himself in drinking the nectar which is no other than Brahman, the nectar which is the outcome of incessant meditation becomes the greatest of ascetics, paramahansa and philosopher, avadhūta. By the sight of him the whole world becomes consecrated. Even an ignorant man who is devoted to his service becomes liberated. (Devotion to him) liberates one hundred and one generations of the devotee's family. Therefore for the same reason the lines of father, wife, and son also become liberated. This is the Upaniṣadic conclusion.'⁽⁴⁸⁾

Avadhūta-Upaniṣad defines avadhūta thus: 'Sāṃkṛtī said thereafter: Having approached Bhagavān Dattātreyā, the sinless philosopher (avadhūta) he asked, Who is a pure philosopher, avadhūta? Dattātreyā, filled with utmost compassion, replied that one was called avadhūta on account of imperishability (akṣaratvāt), an excellence to be devoutly wished for, (varenyatvāt) and on account of casting off all wordly taint, and on account of having the realisation of 'That thou art' as the only object to be aimed at.'⁽⁴⁹⁾ Briefly, imperishability, excellent unworldliness, at-one-ment are the characteristics of the philosopher.

So the philosopher, avadhūta is one who has shaken off from himself all worldly taint and ties; a philosopher is the knower of Brahman, brahma-vid. The root avadhū means to shake off or to shake out or down or frighten away (enemies or evil spirits or disagreeable things). Therefore the avadhūta is literally one who has shaken the shackles of nescience, avidyā from himself or ignorance of misunderstanding which comes through attachment to worldly things without realising that it is eternal bondage. He who has cut himself off from all worldly pleasures save the pleasure of resting in his own Ātman. such a one is the veritable philosopher, avadhūta.

The concept of the philosopher, avadhūta as applied to Dattātreyā illustrates how he is the whole truth consisting of the means, sādhana and the end, sādhya; meditation and liberation. He is individual, jīva. He is auspicious, śiva. He is therefore the identity of jīva and śiva. Jīva stands for meditation; śiva for mokṣa. Therefore through meditation comes liberation, mokṣa or in other words jīva becomes śiva by discipline, sādhana. The previous attributes explain how the concept of philosopher, avadhūta, naturally emerges from them.

X

Dattātreyā is the Lord who has the cardinal directions as his garments, dig-aṁbara. It means that he has the four quarters of the earth as his garment. This concept has a profound significance. For as the Paramahansa-Upaniṣad says: 'Paramahansa is one who has space as his garment. The concept of 'the highest ascetic', of paramahansa has already become familiar in the course of the previous studies.

Nārada-parivṛājaka-Upaniṣad says: 'One who meditates upon, 'I am Brahman itself which is pure consciousness and the highest bliss,' one from whom all desires are cast out, one who has as his garment the four quarters of the earth, one who is liberated from bondage of all kinds by which mind, speech, body and action are fettered, one who has his face turned away from the world he becomes the liberated one in the manner of a creeping worm transformed into a hovering bee. This is the Upaniṣadic conclusion.'⁽⁵⁰⁾

Sanyāsa-Upaniṣad says: 'The highest of the ascetics is he whose body is besmeared completely in ashes, who has abandoned all, whose possession is only his body, whose garment is the four quarters of the earth, who is indeed a philosopher, (having shaken off the shackles of nescience from him) and who is bound by nothing.'⁽⁵¹⁾

A study of these passages shows how intimately 'having the cardinal directions as garment', dig-ambara is connected with being the highest ascetic, parama-hanisa and philosopher, avadhūta. Dattātreyā being a philosopher, avadhūta is necessarily one who has the directions as his garments, dig-ambara. To define him as one who has cardinal directions as garments, dig-ambara, is to concentrate on all those qualities that make him a philosopher, avadhūta.

XI

He whose limbs are smeared with holy ashes is Dattātreyā, bhasmoddhūlita-sarvāṅga. He is the holy one who has besmeared his body in ashes, bhasma. The Upaniṣads attach great sacredness to ashes, bhasma. Brhajjābāla-Upaniṣad says: 'He the well known Bhusuṇḍa came to (the famous god) Kālāgni-rudra. Having come to him he said 'O God! teach me the sacred significance of ashes, vibhūti . . . teach me the Śruti (called Brhajjābāla), that gives the knowledge of the means for attaining liberation'. 'Yes. Thus (said Kālāgni-rudra): From sadyojāta the earth emanated. From it came detachment. From this came (the cow) called Nanda of brown colour. From the dung of this cow (ashes called) vibhūti was produced. From vāmadeva came water. From it came resort. From it appeared the (cow) called bhadrā of black colour. From the dung of this cow (ashes called) bhasita was produced. From aghora fire came. From it came learning. From it came the (cow) called surabhi of red colour. From the dung of this cow (ashes called) bhasma was produced. From īatpuruṣa came air. From it came peace. From it came (the cow) called susīla of white colour. From its dung (ashes called) kṣāra was produced. From īśāna came ether. From it came the state that transcended peace. From it came (the cow) called sumanā of mixed colour. From its dung came (ashes called) rakṣā.'

To trace the whole universe to a single truth has in view the conscious recognition that everything in the world is permeated by the same truth and is therefore a mark of the truth. From this it follows that the higher the manifestation of truth, the higher is the status of the thing in question. Throughout the Vedic tradition the cow is consistently recognised to be the embodiment of the manifestation of truth. It is found out that it contains all that is good in the universe. It is for this reason taken to represent the whole universe. It is therefore described as sarvadevatāmayī, all divine. The Upanisad holds that the whole universe is power, śakti. The cow representing the universe is power. All that comes from it is power. The dung coming from it is power. But the universe as it is created by Śiva is not without impurity. Impurity is the illusion of duality. It is the creation of the omnipotent Śiva. Śiva is the cosmic fire. It burns away all impurity. With the removal of impurity, that is, the delusion of duality, śiva and śakti become one. The fact that the application of fire to dung results in ashes is an outward symbol of the inward union of śiva and śakti. The application of ashes to body indicates for the same reason, the inward realisation of the union of śiva and śakti by burning away all impurities caused by the illusion of duality, that is, the illusion that there is something outside the self.

'Ash, bhasma, has five names: vibhūti, bhasita, bhasma, kṣāra and rakṣā. It is called vibhūti because by means of the five names it immediately brings about spiritual power. It is called bhasma because it consumes all sins. It is called bhasita because it gives illumination. It is called kṣāra because it puts an end to evils. It is called rakṣā because it protects one from the fears caused by the living creatures, the dead, the evil spirits, the demons called brahma-rāksasa, mental decay and bondage.'⁽³²⁾

Sadyojāta, vāmadeva, aghora, īśvara and īśāna are the five aspects of Maheśvara. They are the substance of the world. They give rise to the five elements, panca-bhūtas and the five kinds of cows which form the origin of the five kinds of ashes, bhasma. So ashes, bhasma, stands for the whole universe. It is the expression of the creative principle of all which is Maheśvara himself. This is the philosophical implication of ashes, bhasma.

The same Upanisad states further 'Agni (fire) is one. Having entered into the world it assumes the form corresponding to that of a thing. Similarly, ashes, bhasma, is one. It forms the inner essence of all beings. Outside, it assumes the form corresponding to that of a thing. The whole universe is indeed of the nature of agni-soma, fire-moon. The body-burning causing fear and illuminating is called fire, agni. The body causing power—having the immortal as its basis and having illumination and knowledge as its aspects—is the moon, soma. It is power and immortality—śakti and amṛta. It is indeed the essence and illumination in all things, gross and subtle. Illumination has two forms, the sun and the fire. Similarly, the essence called power, śakti has two forms, moon, soma and fire. Illumination is like the act or flash of lightning. Essence is of the nature of mellow sweetness. All moving and non-moving things exist because of the difference in illumination and essence. The immortal amṛta comes from fire as fire is nourished by the immortal nectar, amṛta. The world of fire and moon, agni-soma is the means of oblation. Moon, soma is the power, śakti, of lifting us upwards as fire, agni, is the power of moving downwards. The upward pull as the downward pull signifies a unity which is brought about by regular swinging of a cosmic rhythm of agni-soma or Haṁsa. The whole world without exception is enclosed by these two. Because of fire, above fire there is power. (The word power signifies) all that is transcendent nectar that forms the essence of moon. (It is above fire) till it lets down the nectar, the essence of moon which is fire itself. For this reason indeed the fire that causes dissolution, kālāgni has downward pull and power has the upward pull. As there is burning in the upward direction there is purity effected in the downward direction. The cosmic fire that causes dissolution is determined to be the basic power. Its location is upward. For the same reason the location of moon is downward and it gets the name śiva-śakti, auspicious power. (The idea is this). The universe signified as moon is based on fire, that is, śiva. It has the upward pull by means of the same fire, śiva. It is thus regularly merged in fire. Thus the unity of fire and power, śiva and śakti is realised. With this realisation there is no longer mere śakti, power, but śiva-śakti, auspicious power. Linga-mahā-purāṇa gives a clear exposition of this unity or identity. In conclusion it says: 'Those aspirants who understand me as rudra, rudrāṇi or gāyatrī, the mother of Veda . . . for them I am in all circumstances the identity of śiva and saumya.'⁽⁵³⁾ That is śakti. This has a spiritual significance. The knowledge constitutive of haṁsa, 'I am He' is equated with Agni, the fire that scorches to ashes in the individual any notion of separateness or duality that may linger. He becomes identified with Śiva, the holy and becomes invested with that power Śiva-Śakti, the power that permeates all. This is the saving truth. Agni is the fire that emanates from Śiva-Śakti, the all-consuming fire that leaves no impurity unburnt to ashes. These ashes become the holy ash, bhasma, with which the body of an ascetic is besmeared. It is symbolical of the ashes in which all impurity or taint or sin has been scorched away. The hymn significantly commences with the word 'agni' and this is in the fitness of things

'(Ashes) bhasma is the power of fire and is bathed in the moon. In the absence of its application it causes bondage from root matter, prakṛti. If (ashes) bhasma is applied and applied to all parts of the body, there is a downpour of immortal power and owing to this, the root matter, prakṛti ceases to bind. So in the case of those good people the application of the immortal ashes, bhasma, is intended to overcome mortality. If the touch of the immortal, the auspicious and power is attained how can there be mortality? He who has understood this abstruse, secret and sacred truth in the manner expounded so far, having produced ashes out of rhythm of the fire-moon combination is never re-born. Having burnt the body by means of fire which is the same as the auspicious he who is bathed in the immortal power following at the same time the path of spiritual discipline, yoga is rendered immortal. He is rendered immortal. Thus is the Upanisadic conclusion.'⁽⁵⁴⁾

The whole passage illustrates how ashes, bhasma is the symbol of the truth of the auspicious, śiva. It is the symbol of identity. The application of ashes, bhasma with the proper understanding of its sacred significance is the highest stage of ethical perfection. It admits of no dualism. It presupposes the realisation of the complete oneness of all that exists. Its application signifies that the person in question has in spirit burnt the world of bondage and in his case there remains only ashes, bhasma, the symbol of the immortal principle of all.

The same Upaniṣad explains the method of preparing ashes, bhasma out of cow-dung. It shows how sacred a cow and its dung are and what disciplines the preparation of ashes, bhasma, presupposes. 'It is said that of all powers the power of learning is the real power. The three-fold constituent, guna, illumination, satva, activity, rajas, and delusion, tamas is the basis of learning. Learning in turn is the basis of the constituents of prakṛti, gunas. (Knowledge, vidyā, is the discrimination between the constituents. It comes from them. By discriminating them it makes them evident.) A cow is the three-fold aspect, guṇa. Its dung and urine have become knowledge, vidyā, that is, they occupy the place of knowledge, vidyā. This is the position expounded by the Upaniṣad. (Having understood this) ashes, bhasma ought to be prepared.'⁽⁵⁵⁾

(Ashes) Bhasma, has thus very great spiritual significance. The whole life of every individual to whatever order of society he may belong is in its own way a preparation for the realisation of the identity of all. (Ashes) Bhasma is the symbol of this realisation. It is therefore indispensable. The same Upaniṣad notes 'Ashes, bhasma ought to be applied to the body, having consecrated the ashes, bhasma by means of hymn, mantra of Veda beginning with the expression mānastokena. The brāhmaṇas, kṣatriyas, further all those of the three-fold varṇas, travarnikas, of those that live as householders . . . by the brahmacārin . . . of the śūdras . . . of all others . . . of the yatis . . . of those that do not observe the rules of varṇas and āśramas . . . of all people (the application of ashes) is indispensable . . . the man of wisdom by whom the mark of three lines by ashes, bhasma, is borne on the forehead, is he by whom the scriptures are studied and understood and all rituals are observed. Even he deserves respect who has given up the practice of the duties of varṇa and āśrama and the rules of conduct as well, if he only bears even once, three horizontal lines of ashes. Those men who practise rituals without the application of ashes never obtain liberation from bondage even through crores of births. That which is the highest essence of the fire of rudra is what goes by the name ashes. Therefore he who has at all times besmeared himself with bhasma is he who has vigour, vīrya, the essence of the fire of rudra, rudrāgni. By means of the application of ashes which is the same as fire, the sins of him who is devoted to ashes are burnt. He who is purified by the bath of ashes is known as one who is devoted to ashes. He, all limbs of whom are bathed in ashes, who bears three lines of ashes, who sleeps on the bed of ashes is the man who is recognised (by Śruti) as being devoted to ashes, bhasma-niṣṭha.'⁽⁵⁶⁾

Thus in the light of the emphasis that Śruti lays on ashes the importance of ashes in rituals and daily life of all can never be over-estimated. The application of ashes is the ritual of rituals. It is also an indication of moral and spiritual discipline. It may, however, be noted that in understanding these passages no room must be given for loose meaning. The Upaniṣadic expressions are based on great spirituality.

Consistently with this the external marks are considered to be the outcome of the inward realisation. Without realisation, mere mark means nothing. (Ashes) Bhasma is the outcome of the creative activity of maheśvara with his five aspects, sadyojāta and so on. These are the forms of Brahman expounded by Veda. (Ashes) Bhasma gives all purusārthas. It is the only content and form of the spiritual discipline leading to liberation, mokṣa. It is knowledge. It is devotion. It is activity. It makes life worth living. It is the mark of the destruction of bondage. It is liberation, mokṣa. It is thus both the means and the end. This is the truth of identity, advaita-tattva. This is maheśvara, mahādeva, the God of Gods.

Bhasmajābāla-Upaniṣad illustrates this idea as: 'Further, Jābāla Bhusuṇḍa offered salutation and requested mahādeva who lived at the peak of the mount kailāsa who was of the nature that forms the origin of Veda, aum, whose body was besmeared with ashes, whose face shone with three horizontal lines of ashes, who was partless, who was attributeless, who was marked by peace, who was the truth of identity and who was auspicious, thus—O Almighty bhagavān! Having brought the essence of Vedic teaching to light teach me that method of bearing three lines which gets liberation, mokṣa to the individual without requiring any other discipline. What is the substance of bhasma?⁽¹⁵⁷⁾ It is clear from this that (ashes) bhasma is the highest of the disciplines. It is therefore all-inclusive. It is the independent means for attaining liberation, mokṣa. It is the expression of identity, advaita. It is the oneness of means and end. It is the truth of mahādeva, who is auspicious, śiva and therefore Dattātreyā himself. In following this idea it must not be forgotten that the application of ashes means finally that all those things that are other than essence are destroyed to ashes and there is the realisation of liberation, mokṣa, following this destruction.

'In the manner defined so far, the person who observes the application of ashes enjoys all pleasures. Having left the body he attains union with the auspicious, śiva. He never comes back. He never comes back. So said kālāgni-rudra, the Almighty itself.'⁽¹⁵⁸⁾

Yoga-tattva-Upaniṣad adds 'One who continues to meditate upon him of three eyes, the giver of gifts, pure, shining like the rising sun, having the whole body smeared with ashes, pleasing by the very appearance . . . to that man of discipline, yogin, there occurs no death, no fear from breath.'⁽¹⁵⁹⁾

The One all limbs of whom are besmeared with holy ashes, bhasmoddūlita-sarvāṅga, is the highest lord, maheśvara. Dattātreyā who is no other than maheśvara is so described. Tripuratāpiny-Upaniṣad prescribes the sacred formula for meditation. 'Salutations sanctioned by the Vedas to the Almighty, whose body is besmeared with ashes and whose splendour, tejas, can never be defied.'⁽⁶⁰⁾

Bhasmajābāla-Upaniṣad explains how great is the importance attached to ashes in the words, 'Bhusuṇḍa having offered salutations to śiva who is the supreme God, whose body was besmeared with ashes, who is the truth of identity, requested . . . teach me O Almighty, by way of bringing to light the essence of the Vedic teaching, the manner in which three lines of (ashes) bhasma are applied to the forehead from which there is the realisation of liberation, mokṣa, without requiring any other means. What is the substance of ashes?'⁽⁶¹⁾

This passage brings out the Vedic character of ashes and how intimately and indispensably (ashes) bhasma forms the content of the means for liberation, mokṣa. Further Dattātreyā is a man of attitude of identity, advaita-bhāvanā. He is a great ascetic. He is liberated while living, jīvanmukta, and philosopher, avadhūta. He is thus one who is undergoing discipline, sādhaka or yogin, following the spiritual discipline leading to liberation, mokṣa. He realises himself as the identity of Śiva, advaita, i.e. mokṣa. He is thus the aim, sādhya. He is therefore identity, maheśvara. In view of these ideas it is but legitimate to characterise Dattātreyā as the Lord whose entire limbs are smeared with holy ashes, bhasmoddūlita-sarvāṅga.

XII

Dattātreyā is considered to be one who wears the crown of matted hair, jaṭā-jūṭa-dhara. This term means that he is one whose lock of hair is reposed high upon his head. In the course of the Upaniṣadic teaching the supreme Lord is constantly described as having matted hair, jaṭā. Rāmapūrvatāpiny-Upaniṣad presents Rāma as 'One who is along with root matter, prakṛti, blue in colour, of the garment yellow in colour, having the lock of hair reposed high upon his head.'⁽⁶²⁾ The Dakṣiṇāmūrti-Upaniṣad presents the supreme Lord as 'The Lord who is in the sitting posture, whose matted hair, jaṭā, is adorned with the shining part of the moon, whose body is as white as milk and who has three eyes.'⁽⁶³⁾ The same observation holds good with reference to Dattātreyā who is described as one who wears the crown of matted hair, jaṭā-jūṭa-dhara.

XIII

Further, Dattātreyā is described as the glorious Lord, vibhu. Mantrika-Upanisad says 'Those twice-born ones who have the eyes of knowledge see only him who is one only and who is the purest, as vibhu'⁽⁶¹⁾ So the term vibhu meaning the 'glorious lord' lays emphasis on the absolute purity and uniqueness of the Lord which can be understood only by those who have the eyes of knowledge among the twice-born or only those with the vision of the truth can comprehend the meaning of 'The Glorious Lord', vibhu. 'The glorious lord', vibhu as applied to Dattātreyā brings to light the greatness of this state, attributes previously described having shown how the truth cannot be otherwise than that pertaining to one described as the glorious lord, vibhu.

Such a noble one is that glorious lord, vibhu, Dattātreyā, the most gracious, who has his being everywhere, universal, all-pervading, omnipresent and eternal. He is therefore rightly called, the glorious lord, vibhu. He is also considered as the glorious lord, vibhu because from him emanate infinite numbers of accomplishments, vibhūtis or manifestations of great might and supernatural powers (aṇumādi-asta-siddhis).

XIV

'With four arms', catur-bāhu, is another characteristic of Dattātreyā. Catur-bāhu is one who has four arms. The meditation on the supreme lord as being a person with four arms is quite common and it may be well to remind ourselves how this conception is far from being considered as theism. This has been explained under the concepts of 'resembling the gem called indra-nīla in complexion', indra-nīla-samaprabha, and being 'all-powerful', prabhu.

Absolutism is higher than theism. Absolutism has in view the highest reality. To attribute a body to it is to bring down its absolute character. This is why theism is not the highest truth. We have a corresponding difference between the conceptions, non-qualified, nirguṇa, and qualified, saguṇa. The attributeless is the absolute. It is devoid of all opposites. To attribute property, guṇa, is to introduce opposites into the absolute. The qualified, saguṇa, is that aspect of God with attributes. Hence the concept of the qualified is lower and the concept of the attributeless is higher. The attributeless is Brahman. The qualified is only an appearance i.e., the result of super-imposing duality, dvaita, on the non-dual, advaita, reality. But is the attributeless nothing? Is it void in the buddhistic sense? No. The word void, śūnya is applied to it following the Upaniṣadic tradition that it is void, śūnya because it is above all contradiction. But the conception is totally different from the buddhistic one. The concept of the attributeless, nirguṇa, is the highest in the sense that it has all the advantages of all other theories of reality. This is a matter to be appreciated fully only by means of study and meditation. It is not mere negation, though the negation of the lower conceptions is in it. It is the undifferentiated, akhaṇḍa. It has all the virtues of the lower conceptions without losing its absoluteness. Viewed from this point of view, the attributeless, nirguṇa, is higher than the absolute of modern thought. This is the significance of the identity of all as presented by the passage of the Śruti as 'All this is indeed Brahman', sarvaṁ khalv idam brahma. This is the reason why the Upaniṣads while concentrating on the highest truth prescribed the meditation on the Lord with or without attributes. This is not to confuse the two view-points. To hold that it is confusion is to uphold the commonsense view of things and to deny the Upaniṣadic character of the Upaniṣads. The Upaniṣadic statements never keep the truth out of sight. This circumstance in the Upaniṣads rather explains the richness of the unity and identity of non-duality. The Upaniṣads insist that without meditation, dhyāna, so as to appreciate the absoluteness, richness and completeness of Reality, the truth cannot be appreciated.

Dhyāna-bindu-Upaniṣad mentions the meditation on the highest thus: 'By means of the control of breath defined as pūraka, the aspirant, yogin, ought to meditate on mahā-viṣṇu who shines with the colour of atasī (Sesbania Grandiflora) flower, who has his seat at the place of the navel and who has four arms.'⁽⁶⁵⁾ Hayagrīva-Upaniṣad presents the significance of the four arms as 'We meditate upon hayagrīva who has four arms, holding respectively, conch, śaṅkha, disc, cakra, the highest sign of knowledge, mudrā and book, pustaka, indicating learning, and who shines like the full moon.'⁽⁶⁶⁾

The significance of the four arms of Dattātreyā must be understood in terms of these ideas; for he is no other than mahā-viṣṇu, who is also the horse-faced hayagrīva.

XV

Dattātreyā is described as one who has capacious limbs, udārāṅga. He who is well built and is of generously proportioned limbs is called udārāṅga in Sanskrit.

XVI

Dattātreyā is further described as one with eyes resembling full-blown lotus flowers, praphulla-kamaleksana. The proportion of limbs as well as body beautiful gains a fresh significance because the face of Dattātreyā is made more beautiful by the fact that he has eyes which resemble a blossomed lotus, praphulla-kamaleksana, one who has gracious eyes which resemble the full blossoming lotuses. This qualifies the grace of his body and further enhances it. In the course of the Upaniṣadic teaching great significance is attached to the eyes because the eyes physically manifest the grace of the spiritual preceptor, guru. Further, beautiful eyes denote a beautiful disposition towards the pupils and the world (generally speaking).

Gopālapūrvatāpiny-Upaniṣad illustrates these ideas: 'Who is Kṛṣṇa? . . . he is one who uproots sins, whose existence is revealed by cow, earth and Veda, who gives birth to the community of gopīs and their intellectual activities. All is enfilled with Him and He is veritably the Supreme Power, māyā. So all is nothing but this highest Brahman. One who meditates upon him, praises him, serves him, becomes immortal . . . what is his form? It is the one that has eyes which resemble a perfect lotus, which has the hue and the lustre of the rain-bearing cloud, which wears the lightning-like raiment, which has two arms, which as a whole is the mystic symbol of knowledge i.e., which wears the garland of forest flowers and which is īśvara, the Supreme Lord.'⁽⁶⁷⁾

This passage illustrates how form, rūpa, illustrates the character of Kṛṣṇa and having eyes resembling full-blown lotus flower, praphulla-kamaleksana as applied to Dattātreyā brings out all this significance because Dattātreyā is no other than Kṛṣṇa.

XVII

Dattātreyā is further defined as the treasure-mine of knowledge, jñāna, and discipline, yoga, jñānayoga-nidhi. He who is the treasure-house of all that is called jñāna-yoga is called jñāna-yoga-nidhi. Jñāna-yoga is a compound term. It means either knowledge with discipline, jñāna with yoga or discipline with knowledge, yoga with jñāna. It presents the idea of the union of the two. Dattātreyā as the treasure-house of this union is not only the source of knowledge, jñāna, and discipline, yoga, but of their union as well. The Upaniṣads do not separate the two. They emphasise the union so that in the end both become one by leading to the realisation of the ever present essence, which is the one only.

Yoga-tattva Upaniṣad says: 'Viṣṇu the well-known lord is the highest of the aspirants as well as of those that are accomplished, yogins. He is the most real and the best of the ascetics. This supreme being is like a light on the path of truth, tattva. The father of fathers, pitāmaha—(brahmā), having worshipped this lord of the world and offering salutations to him prayed to him 'teach me the truth of yoga with its eight preliminaries'. The lord of all organs, indriyas, sensory and motor organs, hr̥ṣīkeśa said, 'I teach you the truth. Understand'. All selves, jīvas are invested with pleasures and pains, the net of nescience, māyā. (I teach you) the path that gives them liberation, that puts an end to the net of nescience, māyā, that destroys, birth, death, old age and illness, that takes one away from mortality. This path is not attainable by all sorts of means. The highest truth to be attained is purity by itself, aloofness, kaivalya. Those that have fallen down into the web of empirical sciences, śāstras (connected with different paths) are for this very reason deluded by their own knowledge. The truth to be attained is beyond description. It cannot be defined even by Gods. It is the same as the revelation of one's Ātman. How can it be revealed by empirical sciences, śāstra? It is partless. It is pure. It is peace itself, peace within and peace without. It is defectless. The same truth being obscured by the results of merit and demerit (appears) in the form of an individual jīva. The truth of the highest Ātman is free from change. How then did it come to have the state of being a jīva? It transcends all that is existent. It is knowledge itself. It is free from all evil. It is illumined like water. In it, in this circumstance, there appeared ego (ahamkāra). There appeared a mass of matter consisting of five aspects which was determined by root matter, prakṛti. It became defined by particular characters. It exhibited pleasures and pains. Consider it to be an individual self, jīva. For this reason, by the pure ones the name of an individual self, jīva is applied to the supreme Ātman. Desire, fear, hatred, also delusion, miserliness, foolhardiness, sin, birth, death, also littleness, misery, exhaustion, hunger, thirst, hankering, shame, fears caused by them, pain, dejection, elevation—from these defects the individual self, jīva, that is liberated is understood to be pure, kevala. Therefore in order to put an end to these defects I teach you the means. How can the knowledge which is without discipline, yoga, really bring about liberation, mokṣa? Indeed, discipline, yoga which is devoid of knowledge is unable to lead to liberation, mokṣa. Therefore one who desires liberation, mokṣa, ought to practise both knowledge and discipline, yoga.⁽⁶⁸⁾

The Upaniṣad has so far expounded how the union of knowledge, (jñāna) and discipline, (yoga) is indispensable. What is knowledge? The same Upaniṣad continues to expound knowledge thus: 'Only nescience, ajñāna, is the cause of bondage. One is liberated only by knowledge. This is at the outset the nature of knowledge. Knowledge is the only source of object. By knowledge is understood the highest truth called aloofness, kaivalya, which forms the essence of the self. It is partless. It is defectless. It is reality, sat, knowledge, cit and bliss, ānanda itself. It is devoid of birth, existence after birth, destruction and recognition or memory. This is what is called knowledge.'⁽⁶⁹⁾

Further, the Sarvasāra-Upaniṣad defines knowledge thus. 'What does knowledge, jñāna mean? The consciousness, caitanya which is devoid of birth and destruction and which is enduring is called, knowledge, jñāna.'⁽⁷⁰⁾

As to what is yoga, the Yogatattva-Upaniṣad expounds it thus: 'Further, I teach you spiritual discipline, yoga. It is well known that discipline, yoga is of many kinds. In usage they differ from one another as mantra-yoga, laya-yoga, hatha-yoga, being different from rāja-yoga. Commencement, eventfulness, cumulativeness, maturation and steadiness characterise all forms. O! Brahman, I teach you their definition in brief. Understand them. A hymn, mantra consists in syllable, mātrkā and so on. One who repeats it for twelve years gradually attains the knowledge along with the eight accomplishments (called aṣṭimā, etc.) The (beginner and therefore) slow in understanding of these that are after discipline, yoga, whose capacity to understand is very limited takes interest in this discipline, yoga. Laya-yoga consists in effecting the destruction of the mind, citta. It is described in many ways. Walking, sitting, sleeping and eating, one ought to meditate on the Lord who is undifferentiated. The same is laya-yoga. Understand further hatha-yoga.

The virtues of restraint, yama, positive virtues, niyama, bodily postures, āsana, breath control, prāṇāsāmyama, unworldliness, pratyāhāra, meditation, dhāraṇa, intense meditation, dhyāna, meditation on hari, locating him between the two eyebrows and absorption, samādhi, which is the state of equilibrium, are the eight preliminaries. Next indeed occurs rāja-yoga. When by means of rāja-yoga activity is effected by the accomplished ones, yogins, then in the same circumstance to the aspirant in question occurs indeed detachment with discrimination. Viṣṇu the well known is the highest of the accomplished ones. He is the most real. He is the best ascetic. With reference to the correct path, that is, in determining the correct path this supreme being is like a light. . . . By him all this is pervaded, so he is the basis of all this. That is real. That is the highest truth. . . . The person who has this discipline, yoga, attains this truth.'⁽⁷¹⁾

This is how the Upaniṣads explain the unity of knowledge, jñāna and discipline, yoga. Jñāna-yoga-nidhi as applied to Dattātreyā illustrates how Viṣṇu the highest truth expounded by the Yoga-tattva-Upaniṣad, is no other than Dattātreyā himself. So in view of this Upaniṣadic teaching Dattātreyā is verily the greatest of those that follow the yogic discipline, mahāyogī; he is the greatest of beings, mahā-bhūta, and the highest of ascetics, mahā-tapāḥ. He is the light that shows the correct path. He is the supreme principle of all, puruṣottama. He is the basis of all reality. He is the real. He is the highest truth. The person who understands him thus and who meditates on him becomes one with him, that is, attains union with him.

XVIII

Dattātreyā is further characterised as the preceptor of the Universe, viśva-guru or world-teacher. 'Dattātreyā the preceptor triumphs', guru dattātreyo vijayate is a prayer which is repeated by the devotees of Dattātreyā, preceptor of the Universe, viśva-guru. As ordinarily understood, guru is a teacher. At times the word is taken to indicate an idea of sacredness too. But the Upaniṣadic sense of the term is really profound and it is in keeping with the truth taught by the Upaniṣads.

Advayatāraka-Upaniṣad says: 'By the grace of the supreme teacher the light that lies concealed in the cave of the intellect or in the turiya level of consciousness becomes inwardly realised. That vision is the root of all good conduct. The teacher is one who is well versed in the knowledge of the scripture, is a lover of the all-pervading supreme Being and is free from envy. He knows all about yoga and is well practised in it. He has the soul of a yogi in him, is pure and imbued with love for his preceptor and above all has realised the Highest Person. The one who has these characteristics is truly called a teacher or guru. Of the two letters in the word guru, the letter gu means darkness and the letter ru means that which removes darkness. For the reason that the preceptor is the remover of darkness he is called guru. The preceptor guru himself is the highest Brahman. The preceptor himself is the highest abode. The preceptor himself is the highest learning or knowledge. The preceptor himself is the best resort. The preceptor is himself the last point of approach. The preceptor himself is the best treasure. For the reason he teaches this truth the preceptor becomes the best of the preceptors. Whoever repeats this once at least, his bondage becomes removed. The sin committed by him throughout his whole course of life becomes immediately destroyed. He attains the fulfilment of all his desires. There is the realisation of all forms of accomplishment, puruṣārthas. He who knows this, knows the truth. Thus is the Upaniṣadic conclusion.⁽⁷²⁾

This passage does not merely present the concept of a preceptor. It elevates him to the rank of a deity for the reason that he has realised the deity within himself and has become one with it. It insists that it is the duty of a proper preceptor, sadguru or sadācārya to evoke in the mind of the pupil a spontaneous reverence and devotion to the preceptor. The purpose of all this elaboration is to fix the connotation of the preceptor by doing which it is sought to fix the connotation of the science of ultimate reality, Brahmavidyā, as the outcome of the teaching of such a preceptor.

Śāṭhyānayanīya-Upaniṣad carries this thought further: 'Further indeed O Somya, who is fitted to receive knowledge! What is so far taught is that which holds good for all times and in all circumstances (sanātana). It is the all-supporting truth, dharma, pertaining to the highest self. It is the practice of this truth which is meant by devotion to viṣṇu. One ought not to teach it without oneself completely understanding it. One ought not to teach it to a person who makes much of tradition, i.e., one who is not prepared to learn anything new; to one who does not understand the truth of self, to one whose mind is vitiated by attachment; to one who is not pure in intention as well as in body; to one who does not himself go to the teacher; and to one who has not made a mental effort of his own. Is this not indeed what is taught by the great seers? The same truth is expounded by Veda as follows:—It is well known that learning, wisdom, knowledge, or the God of learning, vidyā went to him who is devoted to Brahman, brāhmaṇa. It made this request: 'preserve me. I am your treasure. Please do not give me away to one who is envious, whose ways are crooked, and who is stubborn. Only then am I allowed to manifest my efficacy.' This learning, vidyā which is purely spiritual is no other than devotion to viṣṇu. It is the truth of the Self. Thou ought to teach it only after thorough examination, 'to one who does not know it and is eager to know it and who has all the necessary qualifications for receiving it; to one who does not neglect one's duties; to one who has the capacity to grasp it; to one who follows the rule of celibacy, brahmacarya, one who is devoted to the study of scripture and Brahman which is its meaning, and to one who has come seeking the preceptor in search of knowledge, vidyā. If those pupils that have set their minds on knowledge and are devoted to Brahman (vipras), (brāhmaṇas) do not venerate the preceptor in speech, mind and action (then they never would reap the harvest of their study). The man to whom the preceptor is not the master to be lovingly served, fed and tenderly catered to, and who does not will his approbation never reaps the fruit of learning. The preceptor alone is the highest sustenance, dharma. The preceptor alone is the highest aim. If a person ceases to be beholden to a teacher who has taught him even a syllable, then all that learning or knowledge oozes out like water kept in an unburnt earthen pot. As is the supreme devotion to God so is the devotion to a preceptor. He is the knower of Brahman and he hies to the beyond. Such is the commandment of the scripture. So says the Upaniṣad.'⁽⁷³⁾

This passage lays special stress on the following ideas. The greatness of the preceptor consists in his discriminating judgment as to who is fitted to receive knowledge. This gives him an opportunity to find an apt pupil for study. The preceptor is the cherisher of learning, vidyā. Without the preceptor, learning becomes barren of results. True learning can never lead one astray. That which leads itself to prostitution is no learning at all. If the pupil is not endued with the spirit of living laborious days for the sake of learning, and has no endeavour to assimilate what he has learned, he will only be wasting his time. The capacity for privation is the test of knowledge.

In elaboration of this truth of identity, he says further 'I am I, I am also the other. I am Brahman. I am the source of (all things). I am also the preceptor of all the worlds. I am all the worlds. I am He. I alone am. I am the accomplished, siddha. I am the pure. I am the supreme. I am I. I am always He. I am the eternal. I am stainless. I am knowledge. I am excellent. I am the moon. I am the all. I am all that is good. I am devoid of grief. I am consciousness. I am equipoise. I am without honour or dishonour. I am qualityless. I am the holy, śiva.'⁽⁷⁵⁾

Therefore the manifestation of śiva as Dattātreyā is nothing else than Dattātreyā being śiva. So it is but right that Dattātreyā is called the preceptor of the whole world, viśva-guru.

XIX

Dattātreyā is the object of affection of all classes of aspirants, yogi-jana-priya. He is the beloved of all classes of aspirants, yogins. He is the beloved of the aspirants because he is their innermost self or Ātman, and he resides in them. He is their beloved because the aspirants are always and constantly full of love for their Ātman. Since they are the lovers of the Ātman, ātma-priya, they are also lovers of śiva, the auspicious, śivapriya. They have Dattātreyā as their peerless object, the self, Ātman. He is always beloved of all aspirants because he is their love and the object of their spiritual quest.

The word yoga is derived from the root yuj, which means 'to conjoin' or to yoke, that is, literally to merge oneself in the universal being or eternal Ātman which is ever present. Therefore those who practise this discipline of merging the self in the universal being are called aspirants, yogins and they always love their Ātman and continually meditate on it so that Dattātreyā who is no one else but the supreme Ātman, is one beloved of all classes of aspirants, yogins.

All that is in this discipline, yoga, is in Dattātreyā; and especially that pertaining to wisdom, jñāna is of Dattātreyā. He is knowledge itself. Because of this he is called the treasure-house of true wisdom. That true wisdom is called pure consciousness, cinmātra in the Tejo-bindu-Upaniṣad. It is all and everything in this world and nothing is without it. That is wisdom, jñāna.

XX

Being the object of affection of all classes of aspirants, yogins, Dattātreya is full of compassion towards his devotees, bhaktānukampin. He is the protector of his devotees. Those who worship and surrender themselves completely to his grace are under his protection and will be looked after comfortably in this world and the next. He will, by his grace, destroy all sins of his worshippers and grant them liberation. His disposition of compassion gives a fresh significance to the previous attributes, 'being the object of affection of all classes of yogins', yogi-jana-priyam and so on. He is the object of affection of all yogis, yogi-jana-priya, not only because he is the treasure-mine of knowledge and discipline, jñāna-yoga-mūlhi and the preceptor of the whole world, viśva-guru but because he is compassionate towards his devotees. He is ever ready to give them knowledge, jñāna, and discipline, yoga, so as to enable them to realise their union with himself. Further, the attribute 'one full of compassion towards his devotees', bhaktānukampin signifies the truth that that which gives liberation to his devotees is not so much their painful endeavour and upward struggle, the toil and the travail of knowledge and practice as the spontaneous flow of the Lord's compassion. Nay, their knowledge and discipline themselves are the mark of his compassion and an evidence of his concern for his devotees.

XXI

Dattātreya is described as the all-witness, sarva-sākṣin. This term means that he is the eternal witness of all things Sarvasāra-Upaniṣad explains why he is the all-witness, sarva-sākṣin in the following words: 'He is called the witness of all (sarva-sākṣin) for he is himself the witness of the origination and lapse of the cogniser, cognition and the cognised. He is all-witness because he is free himself from origination or lapse and shines by his own light.'⁽⁷⁸⁾ This is why he is characterised as 'real, knowledge and bliss', saccidānanda and considered to be the Ātman of all things. As the witness of all he is the witness of all that occurs to his devotees. He is the author of all those occurrences because he is intent on the unravelling of power, ātma-māyā-rata. All is his creation, it is the expression of his power, māyā. It is the overflow of his bliss, ānanda. So he is the witness, that is, the author of knowledge, jñāna and discipline, yoga of his devotees. Further, he is the author of their liberation. This explains how his compassion the real means for the liberation of his devotees. The devotees themselves with their devotion, bhakti, and faith, śraddhā are his creation. And he who is in all, the peerless, the witness of all is what all-witness sarva-sākṣin signifies.

XXII

Dattātreyā is further defined as one who is served by the accomplished ones, siddha-sevita. The truth of Dattātreyā as it is so far indicated implies that for his devotees he is more than liberation. This is the real significance of his being the object of affection of all classes of aspirants, yogi-jana-priya. It is not for the sake of obtaining liberation that yogins feel attracted towards him, but they are attracted towards him for his own sake. He is more than liberation because he is the author of liberation. He is the magnet that attracts all without difference and gives to all the benefit of that magnet impact. Those who have been touched by his grace are the accomplished ones, siddhas. So the title, 'served by the accomplished ones siddhas', is fittingly accorded to Lord Dattātreyā. This accomplishment is no other than knowledge, jñāna, discipline, yoga, and liberation, mokṣa in unison. Dattātreyā the giver of all is everything for them. He is the be all and end all of their existence. Their sole object is to emulate the example of their great preceptor. Since an achievement of success rests on his grace, those who become accomplished persons have no other purpose than serving their master and thus grow to be like him. As the Lord Dattātreyā himself says he loves those most who meditate on him as 'I am Datta, that is Dattātreyā', 'dattoham'. The one object of the accomplished ones is to become one with one's preceptor and serve his lotus feet. He is always and continuously served by the accomplished ones.

One who thus meditates upon the greatness of Lord Dattātreyā, the God of Gods, devadeva, the most eternal, thus attains liberation free from all sins and will not be lacking in the auspicious vision dṛṣṭi which is necessary to attain success. Thus the Upaniṣad projects before our vision the meaning of Dattātreyā as the gift of the great Lord Maheśvara to the stricken world. Dattātreyā is born of penance tapas, and by penance alone can he be intuited and grasped. In order to do so the Upaniṣads give subtle and elaborate meanings for the devotees to think about.

2. DATTĀTREYA: MEDITATION

To sum up what has gone before, a few words on meditation may not seem out of place here.

Commonly speaking, Dattātreyā is considered to be one of the incarnations, avatāras of Viṣṇu. In the Bhāgavata-Purāṇa he is credited with having great spiritual powers and being the teacher of discipline, yoga, to a number of disciples. Lord Dattātreyā's views on spiritual discipline, yoga, are clearly and explicitly stated in the Jābāla-Darśana-Upaniṣad when the Lord gives a masterly exposition of it to his favourite disciple, Sāṃkṛti. In it is described in great detail the discipline, yoga, consisting of eight limbs, astāṅga-yoga, the ultimate purpose of which is attainment of oneness with Śiva, śivātva.

For such a person, the Upaniṣad says: 'If one realises in the absolute sense, the self as it is, then the whole world becomes realised to be nothing but sport, māyā, and there follows spiritual bliss.'⁽⁷⁷⁾

Dattātreyā is generally invoked in prayers as atri-gotra-samudbhava, one who is born in the family of Atri. But at times he is also invoked as 'one who is born from the eyes of Atri', atrinetra-samudbhava. What does this mean? Literally it means one who was created or took his birth or came out of the eye of Atri. But eye, netra also means eye of knowledge, jñāna-cakṣus. So it can also be said that figuratively he was born of the eye of Atri, the eye symbolising the eye of knowledge, jñāna-cakṣus or sphūrti, flame of penance, tapas. The intuition of truth that penance gives can only be discerned with the inward eye. It also signifies that as a result of the severest of penances, Atri was able to grasp maheśvara, that is nārāyaṇa to be naught else but his own Ātman, and maheśvara being thus pleased with his tapas (penance) gave himself (parameśvara) as boon to his devotee (Atri). The result of Atri's penance was Dattātreyā. It was the identification of Atri and maheśvara as one.

In another work called Tripurā-Rahasya, we see Dattātreyā as the exponent of śākta worship generally and also the advocate of the knowledge of absolute identity, paramādvaita-jñāna which is called Tripurā-Pārameśvarī. The content of this knowledge is in the same work defined thus: 'Tripurā is purely of the essence of the infinite power, all witnessing, pure consciousness and all complete as it is free from all limitations.'⁽⁷⁸⁾ There are three kāṇḍas or chapters of the rahasya called jñāna, māhātmya and upāsana. Jñāna is knowledge, māhātmya is greatness and upāsana is meditation. Knowledge, jnāna is considered to be the only vital factor that is essential for the successful termination of the mission of life. It is supposed to be the realisation that comes to great souls when they intuit that the only form of existence or life there, is that the supreme being who by its own volition manifests itself in this world in all the different forms of life and matter that together constitute the world. The knowledge that arises out of that fact is the real case of knowledge, jnāna. It is the only thing that remains, will remain and will always continue to remain when all else that is nescience disappears out of the Lord's grace. This supreme attitude is very difficult to explain clearly or satisfactorily. It is at best only intuited by the fortunate few, vipras, through the grace of God, īśvarānugraha. It is best described or understood only by those who attempt to practise spiritual discipline, yoga, or who by some rare gift, apūrvā-saṁskāra thus attain to this state of beatitude. The chapter on knowledge, jnānakāṇḍa, gives a list of those rare souls who attain to this state in this very life, one of them being Janaka, the celebrated and renowned king of Mithilā.

It may however be noted that the foregoing ideas show that the world has no status of its own. Having arrived at this conclusion men of wisdom hold, 'Those who understand what reflection is, hold that all this world as experienced by all is only a reflection. No part of it appears independently. It appears only because of spirit, caitanya. The world is therefore taken to be like the reflection seen in a looking glass.'⁽⁷⁹⁾

So the world is but a reflection or image. This is why it is inert. It cannot shine forth by itself. But because it reflects Ātman it is of that Ātman. Ātman enables it to appear as the source of illumination. It is for this reason that it (the world) shines forth. Therefore the world is but the reflection of Ātman. It is like the reflection of an object in a mirror. This idea is brought out very clearly in the Dakṣiṇāmūrti-Stotra by Śaṅkara:—

'The universe is like the image of a city seen in the depths of the mirror. It arises out of the self due to illusion. It looks as if the world lies out there. It is like the objects in the dream that one dreams. On waking up one realises that all that was seen was those in one's own undivided self. Salutation to Śrī Dakṣiṇāmūrti, the very embodiment of a preceptor.'⁽⁸⁰⁾

He who gains victory over illusion, māyā, is the liberated even while he is alive, jīvanmukta. This liberation comes through the grace of maheśvara, the preceptor. In recognition and practice of this truth Avahdūta-Gītā begins with the words: 'The fragrance of non-duality is the graceful gift of God to men'.⁽¹⁸¹⁾ In this passage Lord Dattātreyā himself makes the momentous announcement that the gnosis of non-duality, advaita-jñāna will not come except through the grace, anugraha, of the Lord Īśvara. Therefore only an aspirant who is fitted, adbhūkārī for spiritual wisdom and who is the recipient of the grace of the Lord, īśvarānugraha, can succeed in his undertaking the discipline, yogic sādhanā. Having understood the significance of all this, there remains for us as our one duty, the prayer: 'May the most auspicious five-faced god, sadāśiva, Dattātreyā himself, the preceptor, always execute his great dance of grace on the pedestal of the thousand-petalled lotus, (sahasra-kamala-pīṭha) of the devotee, (śiṣya).'

There is a beautiful chain formula of the deity, Dattātreyā, as represented by Dattātreyā-Upaniṣad. It is taught to a devotee of great detachment. The meaning of this is therefore naturally spiritual. It brings out the all-absorbing, (plenum) pūrṇa character of Reality. This explains how the truth is non-dual, advaita, that is, advaya. Adhyātma-Upaniṣad says: 'The highest Brahman is self-complete and non-dual.'⁽¹⁸²⁾ It is a salutation of sadāśiva himself. In the course of the meditation the devotee prays for spiritual strength and shelter from all evil that stands as impediment in the way of spirituality.

The following is the chain formula of the deity, Dattātreyā—One should utter aum. 'Aum' salutation unto the Lord Dattātreyā, propitiated by remembrance alone, who is the dispeller of great fears, who bestows the highest knowledge, who is of the character of knowledge and bliss, who is in the guise of a child, a mad man and a devil, thus: who is a great yogin, who is a philosopher, who is the enhancer of the joy of Anasūyā, his mother, and is the son of the sage Atri, thus: who bestows the fruits of all desires of the devotees' heart. Here one should utter aum. Unto the redeemer from the bonds of worldly existence—here one should say hrīm. Unto him that bestows all kinds of powers: thus: here one should call upon hrom. Unto him that attracts all kinds of accomplishments like a magnet, thus: here one should come out with saṃh. Unto the agitator of all minds: here one should pronounce śrīm. Here one should proclaim mahom. Unto the long lived: here one should utter vasat. Pray do thou subjugate—Do thou attract—here one should utter Vauṣat. Do thou attract: Here one should say hum. Do thou antagonise—Do thou antagonise: Here one should mutter phaṭ. Do thou drive away—Do thou drive away—Do thou drive away: here one should pronounce tha tha. Do thou paralyse—Do thou paralyse: here one should mutter kha kha. Do thou kill—Do thou kill: Salutation to the highly accomplished one: salutation to the highly accomplished one: here for the sake of the all accomplished, one should proclaim avāhā. Do thou nourish (my body). Do thou nourish (my body). Do thou mangle, do thou tear beyond shape (my) adversaries' mystic incantations, mystic symbols and mystic formularies. Do thou counteract the malignant influence of evil spirits, grahas. Do thou counteract. Do thou cure all ailments. Do thou cure all ailments. Do thou drive off all anguish. Do thou drive off all anguish. Do thou melt away all penury. Do thou melt away all penury. Do thou nourish (my) body. Do thou nourish (my) body. Do thou fill the mind with joy. Do thou fill the mind with joy. Unto thee the real form of all mystic incantations, all mystic symbols, all mystic formularies and all mystic powers, thus aum, salutation unto śiva. Thus the Upaniṣad.⁽⁸³⁾

In this prayer, the Sanskrit letters or words, aum, hrīm and so on invite Dattātreyā, the omnipotent to chase away the evils. These evils are the possible adverse circumstances that stand in the way of spiritual realisation. The truth that Dattātreyā is all-power, sarva-śakti is the significance of the attributes 'being intent on unravelling of power', ātma-māyā-rata, or 'sportful disposition', ātma-kṛīḍa and so on as applied to Dattātreyā. To understand this is to see the unity of scriptural teaching, Śruti and Smṛti. Repetition of the prayer signifies the realisation of power in any sense as being an attribute in an exclusive sense of the truth, absolute, that is, Dattātreyā. This is the highest form of the realisation of the one-ness of God-head in the face of which all faiths of narrow outlook melt away and there shines one supreme Reality. In illustration of this truth, Brahma-Sūtra (2.1.30) says: 'It has all also because there is the realisation of it (stated in Śruti).'⁽⁸⁴⁾ Śaṅkarācārya gives the meaning of the Sūtra as: 'It must be accepted that this absolute divinity is omnipotent. Why? Because it is the truth expounded by the Śruti. Śruti expounds omnipotence to be the attribute of the Absolute.'⁽⁸⁵⁾ Dattātreyā is thus all gods, all creatures and all that exists. He is the means and end—upāśnā and mokṣa. These two are the real contents of life. He is thus the whole of life. This is his identity, advaita or advaya character.

We have studied so far how Dattātreyā is the highest truth. The realisation of this truth is liberation, mokṣa. Dattātreyā is the means, sādhana as well. The state of being liberated while being alive, jīvanmukti and the state of being a philosopher, avadhūtātva are the chief contents of means, sādhana. To study Dattātreyā as being liberated while he is alive, jīvanmukta, and as being a philosopher, avadhūta, and as the teacher of these ideals is therefore imperative in understanding the truth of identity, advaita-tattva, the truth of Dattātreyā.

The need for meditation will thus surely be realised as the one sure and successful means by which that understanding which passeth all words can come. The act of intuition and establishment of the person's whole being in the realisation 'I am He' 'I am the Haṁsa' is the last phase of this spiritual process. For its complete fulfilment and fruition meditation is the most necessary ingredient and the royal road to success. It is the method adopted and perfected with great skill by our forbears.

Thus the sketch of Dattātreyā including meditation on him is an exposition of the truth taught by the Hymn to Dattātreyā. The Upaniṣad concludes thus 'the sacred mother of the Vedas, the eternal truth, satya, aum—Thus the Upaniṣad.'

This mental pictorial praise of Dattātreyā, Datta-mānasa-stuti, may be concluded with an invocation to the preceptor, the guru (Dattātreyā himself).

'The preceptor is Brahmā. The preceptor is Viṣṇu. The preceptor himself is Maheśvara. The preceptor is no other than the highest Brahman. Salutations to that Preceptor Dattātreyā.'⁽⁸⁶⁾

'I offer my salutation to the Lord Dattātreyā, the divine tree that satisfies those that are devoted to him, ocean of bliss which is no other than himself, the secondless, the divine and the remover of the illusion that causes bondage.'⁽⁸⁷⁾

'Auspicious I am! Śivoham.'

Aum śāntih śāntih śāntih.

CHAPTER III

DATTĀTREYA: THE SPIRITUAL DISCIPLINE:

I. DATTĀTREYA: THE LIBERATED IN LIFE.

THE JIVANMUKTA-GITĀ

(attributed to Lord Dattātreya)

MAṄGALAM

asato mā sad gamaya tamaso mā jyotir gamaya mrtyor mā amṛtaṁ gamaya

‘Lead me from the unreal to the real.
Lead me from darkness to light
Lead me from the mortal to the immortal.

I

sarva-bhūtāntarasthāya nitya-mukta-cid-ātmane pratyak-caitanya-rūpāya mahyaṁ eva namo namaḥ

(sarva-bhūtāntar-vartine nitya-mukta-cit-svarūpiṇe sarva-sākṣiṇe mahyaṁ eva svātmana eva namaḥ. nama iti dvir-uktiḥ ādarārthaṁ)

‘I offer again and again humble salutations to that great Being which is immanent in all creation, which shines forth as consciousness, cit and which is ever liberated, which is the witness of all actions and true knowledge and which is no other than my innermost self.’

This verse is taken from the Vārāha-Upaniṣad (2.33). The Upaniṣadic verse is followed by ‘tubhyaṁ mahyaṁ anantāya mahyaṁ tubhyaṁ cidātmane.’ ‘For you, for me which is infinite: for me, for you which is the self, spiritual.’ Consistently with this idea mahyaṁ in the present verse refers to the self underlying all. This is one’s innermost self.

Tejobindu-Upaniṣad ⁽¹⁰⁴⁾ says: ahaṁ brahmeti niścitya ahaṁ bhāvaṁ parityaja. ‘Having attained the conviction ‘I am Brahman’, give up all egotism.’

It follows from all this that aham according to the Vedic tradition refers to the Self, the underlying principle of all.

The fact that the present verse is the restatement of the Upaniṣdic passage illustrates the Vedic character of the Jīvanmukta-Gītā.

Cit· cit is consciousness. It is the principle of mind. It is the source of mind. It is the truth. It is the highest knowledge or understanding itself. It is beyond mind. The Devī-Bhāgavata begins with a salutation to that supreme being (the Goddess Ambā—the great universal mother), personified as pure consciousness, cailanya:

'We understand that (truth) which is the spiritual principle underlying all and the primus inter pares of all knowledge, that is, knowledge of knowledge, vidyā of vidyās. May it direct our minds.'⁽¹⁸⁸⁾

The expression, 'one who is ever liberated', nitya-mukta refers to that supreme being (whom we term God) as that state wherein it (the Supreme Being) exists transcending the two-fold body . . . the gross, the subtle, the body called linga and the body called saguna; the three-fold state of existence, waking, dream and dreamless sleep, the five sheaths of the body, the physical, anna-maya, the vital, prāna-maya, the mental, mano-maya, the spiritual, vijnāna-maya, and the blissful, ānanda-maya; the twenty-five categories of reality, tattvas, the root matter, prakṛti the intellect, mahat, egoism, ahamkāra; the five sense organs, eye, ear, nose, tongue and the organ of touch; five motor organs, speech, hand, foot, organ of excretion and organ of enjoyment; and mind, manas five subtle elements, tanmātras, sound, touch, colour, taste and odour, and five elements, ether, air, fire, water, and earth together with spirit, puruṣa. According to the philosophy of śiva-śakti there are thirty-six categories including śiva. The thirty-six categories, tattvas, are five spiritual, cidrūpa, seven spiritual-nonspiritual, cidacidrūpa, and twenty-four nonspiritual. The spiritual are śiva, śakti, sadāśiva, īśvara and vidyā. The spiritual-nonspiritual are māyā, kāla, nṛyati, kalā, vidyā, rāga and puruṣa. The non-spiritual are avyakta, buddhi, ahamkāra, manas, five sensory organs, five motor organs, five subtle elements (tanmātras) and five gross elements. Vidyā as a non-spiritual entity is accepted as the cause of the perception of pleasure and pain. The spiritual categories manifest omniscience and omnipotence in the souls. The spiritual-nonspiritual categories manifest imperfect knowledge and imperfect action. The nonspiritual categories take the form of pleasure, pain and so on. These principles according to the Hindu conception of man's creation constitute the sum total of man's physical as well as mental being. The whole meaning of this very śloka is that the Supreme Being is the same in all elements of existence. Therefore it is the same to all different religions and peoples. This is illustrated by its universal immanence and its being the witness of all action.

II

jīvan-muktiś ca yā muktiḥ sā muktiḥ piṇḍa-pātane yā muktiḥ piṇḍa-pātane sā muktiḥ śuni sūkare

(jīvan-muktir iti yā muktiḥ ucyate sā yadi piṇḍa-pātana parā tarhi sā muktiḥ sūkarādiṣv api prasaktā bhavati ity arthaḥ. Piṇḍa-patanam na jīvan-muktir iti bhāvaḥ.)

'The liberation while the individual is still alive is called jīvanmukti. It connotes a definite state. If it is identified with the death of the physical body, then that liberation which results from the death of the physical body applies equally to the animals such as dogs and pigs.'

The point that Lord Dattātreya wishes to bring out by this passage is that the state of being liberated while one is alive, jīvanmukti, is profoundly different from what it is ordinarily understood to be. It is in the first place different from death. Death is common to all creatures, whereas, the state of being liberated while alive, jīvanmukti, is a rare gift that occurs to particular human beings, the disciplined ones, yogins, or the accomplished ones, siddhas. Therefore it must be carefully defined and understood. For it is liberation, mukti, that occurs to one who is still in the physical body engaged in all the activities of life. In the second place it is an expression of complete cessation of misery. Life in general is marked by misery because in general it is the source of misery. But the state of being liberated while alive, jīvanmukti, is the single exception. Further if any one does not believe in the state of being liberated while alive, jīvanmukti and still believes in liberation, mukti, then death must be taken to mean liberation, mukti. But this explanation is too wide and it proves nothing. Liberation, mukti therefore is necessarily preceded by the state of being liberated while alive, jīvanmukti. What is then the state of being liberated while alive, jīvanmukti? It is that state wherein a person is liberated even as he is alive in the body. He is therefore called one who is liberated.

Jīvanmukti is an important concept in Vedic thought. In the Mundaka-Upaniṣad we are told vimuktaśca vimucyate—‘One who is already liberated becomes liberated.’ This one ‘who is already liberated’ is the one who is called jīvanmukta in the later Upaniṣads such as Varāha-Upaniṣad, Mahopaniṣad, Annapūrṇa-Upaniṣad and Ātmopaniṣad. In these Upaniṣads this concept is defined and elaborately discussed.

In the Darśana literature also the problem of jīvanmukti has acquired great prominence. Independent works too are written on this problem. In illustration of this point ‘The Jīvanmukti-Viveka’ of Śrī Vidyāranya may be cited. In the case of a man who is alive, doership, enjoyership, pleasure, pain and so on which are the states of mind, and being of the nature of misery become causes of bondage. The removal of this misery is the state of liberation while one is alive.⁽⁸⁹⁾

III

Who is he that is liberated while alive, jīvanmukta? The Lord gives the answer—

jīvaḥ śivaḥ sarvaṃ eva bhūtesv evaṃ vyavasthitaḥ evaṃ evābhi-pāśyan hi jīvan-muktaḥ sa ucyate

(jīva iti yah sah sarva-bhūteṣv-apī śivatvenaiva vyavasthitaḥ śiva eva. tad-jñānī jīvan-mukta ity arthah.)

‘Jīva is śiva itself. It is thus in the manner defined, immanent in all creatures. The person who sees only this truth in life is said to be the liberated though alive.’

‘Thus in the manner defined’ refers to the opening passage ‘sarva-bhūtāntarasthāya . . . pratyak-caitanya-rūpāya’. The fact that this spirit caitanya, which is the underlying principle of all is immanent in all creatures, bhūteṣu vyavasthitaḥ, illustrates how jīva is śiva. Thus is emphasised the identity of the individual with the universal. So affirms the Śruti: ‘That Thou art’, tat tvam asi; ‘I am Brahman’, aham brahmāsmi; ‘He am I’, soham asmi; ‘He alone am I’, sa evāham asmi; ‘Śiva I am’, śivoham, ‘Datta I am’, dattoham; and so on. Their identity is not the identity of jīva and śiva. It consists on the other hand in seeing the truth of śiva in what is called jīva. Śiva is consciousness and bliss—cid-ānanda. Jīva is the same. The person who takes his stand based upon this truth which is immanent within himself is said to be liberated in life.

IV

If identity is the truth, where is then the necessity for the appearance of an individual, jīva? Lord Dattātreyā answers:—

evam brahma jagat sarvaṁ akhilaṁ bhāsate raviḥ saṁsthitam sarva-bhūtānām jīvan-muktaḥ sa ucyate

(yathā raviḥ sarvaṁ jagat bhāsate evam brahma sarva-bhūtānām ātmatvena saṁsthitam sat akhilaṁ bhāsate prakāśayati. evam evānhipaśyan ity anuvartate. saḥ tādrśaḥ jñānī jīvan-mukta ity ucyate ity arthaḥ.)

‘Even as the sun illumines the whole world, Brahman which is immanent in all creatures illumines the whole world. He who realises this is said to be liberated in life.’

Without the sun’s light in different forms we do not see the world. Seeing is finally the being. The unseen is non-existent. Similarly without Brahman, the illumination, caitanya of all there is no illumination of the world, that is, there is no world at all. Brahman is intent on unravelling of power, ātma-māyā-rata. Its bliss, ānanda, consists in unravelling its own power, māyā. To appear as individual, jīva, is to unravel power, māyā. Brahman is therefore bliss, ānanda. This is the teaching of Śruti. The Kaṭha-Upaniṣad says: ‘The sun does not shine there, nor the moon, nor the stars, no lightning flashes, nor does the fire light up the things. All is illumined by Its illumination.’⁽⁹⁰⁾

The idea that the person who realises this truth is a jīvanmukta is the exposition of the statement of the Śruti such as ‘This is the highest viṣṇu, viṣṇoryat paramaṁpadam, that is, śiva, Brahman, Dattātreyā. Men of wisdom see it without break’⁽⁹¹⁾, ‘May we understand the form of the Lord’⁽⁹²⁾, and so on. This seeing or understanding is of the nature of intuition.

It is this intuition of the highest that distinguishes the one that is liberated in life from others. It is just the recognition of the universal existence behind all the manifold particular forms of many that constitutes living reality. With this intuition the one who is liberated in life is an indispensable evidence for the truth of identity of the individual with the universal.

V

Brahman is one. How can it have many forms? Lord Dattātreya answers —

ekadhā bahudhā caiva drśyate jala-candra-vat ātma-jñānī tathaivaiko jīvan-muktaḥ sa ucyate

(jala-candra-vat jale candraḥ yathā anekadhā drśyate tathaiva ekah ātmā. upādhi-bhedena ity adhyāhārah . . . ekadhā bahudhā caiva drśyate. evaṁ ātmānam yo jñānī sah ātma-jñānī jīvan-mukta ity ucyate.)

‘Even as the moon which appears manifold when reflected in water, in the form of tanks, lakes, rivers or pots, and yet it is one single entity, Ātman the self appears as many when it takes on different forms (and yet it is one only, being absolutely indivisible) Only that person who knows the truth of Ātman is said to be liberated in life, jīvan-mukta.’

Water is the cause of (or occasion for) different reflections of the moon. Similarly the cause, upādhi for the many forms of Brahman is the power of māyā. Manyess is merely the-appearance. Indivisibility is the truth. This is the teaching of Śruti: ‘Brahman is devoid of the difference from the similar and the dissimilar and is itself devoid of all differences within itself.’⁽¹⁰³⁾ ‘All this is indeed Brahman.’⁽¹⁰⁴⁾ and ‘There is not duality in any sense with reference to Brahman, the basis (adhisṭhāna) of all reality.’⁽¹⁰⁴⁾ This is the truth taught by the Lord.

VI

The Lord gives the reason why of all persons only the one who knows the self is the one who is liberated in life. The reason is the realisation of the identity of Ātman. Why is realisation so difficult to attain? Lord Dattātreya answers:

sarva-bhūte sthitaṁ brahma bhedābhedo na vidyate ekaṁ evābhipaśyaṁś ca jīvan-muktaḥ sa ucyate

(brahma sarva-bhūtasthitam. yatra bhedaḥ abhedaḥ bhedābhedo na vidyate. tat ekaṁ eva. evaṁ abhi paśyaṁs ca yaḥ sa jīvan-mukta ity ucyate.)

‘Brahman is immanent in all that exists. For this reason it is devoid of difference or identity, that is, it cannot be defined in terms of difference, bheda, non-difference, abheda, or difference-non-difference bhedābheda. The person who sees Brahman strictly in this manner is said to be the liberated though alive.’

In the previous passages the knower of identity is called the liberated though alive. Identity is non-difference, abheda. To define Brahman in terms of non-difference, abheda is after all to bring Brahman down to the plane of difference, bheda. To define is to distinguish. To distinguish is to modify universality. Brahman which is universal as spirit, caitanya, transcends therefore definition per se. To realise this is to realise identity and it is a rare gift. To talk of identity is easy, but to think of the state of transcending definition as such is extremely difficult. This shows how it is no ordinary achievement to become liberated in life.

The person who has this realisation is usually called the one who has the eye of knowledge, jñāna-netra. This is the so called third eye of the man. It grasps or sees things that the two physical eyes are unable to grasp. It is the eye of intuition. This eye is also called suṣumnā-nāḍī or sarasvatī, the unseen third river which is supposed to flow at the confluence of the Ganges (gangā) and Jumna (yamunā) at Prayāg. This eye is in the middle of the eye-brows; where the right eye is the Ganges and the left is Jumna, while between them, in the middle of the forehead, is the sarasvatī. Brahman that is realised by this eye of knowledge is the highest with reference to which the Brhad-Āraṇyaka-Upaniṣad says: ‘It is apprehended only by the intellect, buddhi,’⁽⁹⁵⁾ because as Kaṭha-Upaniṣad explains ‘it transcends all the instruments of knowledge—speech, mind and eye.’⁽⁹⁶⁾

196283

By Central

VII

What is the character of the man who has realised this truth? Lord Dattātreyā says:—

tattvaṁ kṣetraṁ vyomātītaṁ ahaṁ kṣetrajña ucyate ahaṁ kartā ca bhoktā ca jīvan-muktaḥ sa ucyate

(tattva-svarupam evam asti. ksetram ākāśātitaṁ, paramātmā kṣetrajñah. kartṛtvaṁ bhoktṛtvaṁ ca tasyaiva evam yo vijānāti saḥ jīvan-mukta ucyate)

'The nature of Reality is as follows.—The body transcends the limitations of space The Supreme Being is the soul in it I am the actor and the experience as well He who knows it thus is named the Jīvanmukta, the liberated in life '

The body referred to is not the gross body, because it is defined as vyomātīta or transcending this atmosphere. This body is called linga-śarīra or subtle body. It consists of five subtle elements, eleven organs, ego-hood, ahamkāra, and the material principle of intellect, buddhi. While the gross body comes into being and goes out of it in the course of the life of an individual, linga-śarīra accompanies the individual till he gets liberated. To attribute doership and enjoyership to the supreme self, kṣetrajña is to give up the illusion that the individual is the doer and enjoyer. To give it up is detachment, vairāgya. That is the very first item of the character of a man of wisdom, jñānin. According to the Bhagavad-Gītā 'This is now obtained by me. I shall now have the fulfilment of my desire.' 'Thus are they deluded by nescience, ajñāna.'⁽⁸⁷⁾ But the 'aham', (I) of the verse referred to in the previous paragraph is not the deluded 'I' but the 'I' which means the paramātmā.

VIII

Lord Dattātreyā presents the further traits of the wise man's character.

karmendriya parityāgī dhyāna-varjita-cetasah ātma-jñānī tathāiveko jīvan-muktaḥ sa ucyate

(karmendriya-parityāgī sva-sva-vyāpāra-rahitāni jñānendriyāni karmendriyāni ca kurvan tāni parityajati ity arthah. tathā cetah apī viśaya-dhyāna-varjitam karoti evam advayam jñāti yah sa jīvan-muktaḥ.)

'Only he who has relinquished the conative senses and the introspective faculty but has realised the soul within him is said to be Jīvanmukta, the liberated in life.'

The idea underlying the above text is this: With the activities of the outgoing senses and a roving mind a person becomes externally engaged or extrovert (bahirmukha), full of somatic activity. His mind and activity are dispersed and dissipated in a world of multiplicity. If the turmoil of multiplicity is quietened the mind would cease to function in the usual way and he becomes fixed in Ātman. This makes him the knower of the self and the liberated though alive. Bhagavad-Gītā says: 'If like a tortoise which retracts its limbs fully, the person retracts his sense organs from their objects, then his knowledge becomes steady.'⁽⁹⁸⁾ The same idea is illustrated by Kaṭha-Upaniṣad: 'If the five-fold knowledge with mind and intellect does not function, then that state is the highest they say.'⁽⁹⁹⁾

IX

Lord Dattātreyā presents the next step of the wise man's, jñānin's realisation. By means of the psycho-somatic discipline that is so far expounded he has his detachment well entrenched. With this sort of detachment what kind of life is open to him is the question. The Lord answers:

śārīraṁ kevalaṁ karma śoka-mohādi-varjitaṁ śubhāśubha-parityāgī jīvan-muktas sa ucyate

(jñāninā yat karma kriyate tat śoka-mohādi-varjitaṁ. tac ca kevalaṁ śārīra-parirakṣaṇāyaiva. evaṁ tena śubhāśubhādikaṁ parityaktaṁ bhavati. sa jīvan-mukta ucyate.)

'He whose somatic activity is free from grief and infatuation, and the one who has no concern whatever with what is agreeable or disagreeable is called the liberated in life.'

In this passage the Lord teaches the principal ideas expounded by Śruti and Smṛti with regard to the present problem. The Isāvāsyopaniṣad having first expounded oneness of Ātman, ekatva, observes, 'Where is moha, 'delusion'? Where is śoka 'grief'? in the case of one who has realised the oneness of the Lord.'⁽¹⁰⁰⁾ The Bhagavad-Gītā says 'The person who does only that thing which is absolutely needed to effect the continuation of body i.e., life, does not suffer from sin.'⁽¹⁰¹⁾ The same work says earlier 'The person who is attached to nothing, having obtained those things which are called by others good or evil, does not either appreciate or hate, the knowledge of this person is established.'⁽¹⁰²⁾ The same work says 'If you happen to be completely devoid of activity then even the continuation of the body i.e., life, becomes impossible.'⁽¹⁰³⁾

X

Is this to welcome dualism to this extent at least? Lord.Dattātreyā says 'No.'

karma sarvatra ādiṣṭam na jñāmi ca kimcana karma brahma vijānāti jīvan-muktaḥ sa ucyate

(yah ādiṣṭam vidhyuktam karma na jñānāti kartṛtvāropena karma na karoti ity arthaḥ. ata eva karma brahma-svarūpaṁ eveti vijānāti saḥ jīvan-muktaḥ)

'The person who has come to the decision 'I do not know any activity in any sense that is supposed to have been ordained (by śāstra), that is, the person who never observes any action by super-imposing doership on himself, and understands that activity as such is Brahman itself, is one who is said to be the liberated in life.'

This is the answer given to the question about dualism. To retain activity in any sense, retaining the super-imposition of 'doership' is to give room for dualism. For, against a doer the creative principle cannot be established. But to retain activity as the expression of the creative principle itself, call it caitanya or Brahman, gives no room for dualism. This is the nature of activity taught by śāstra. It rather illustrates the truth of the creative principle rather than the individual doer set over against it.

XI

Lord Dattātreyā states the results of the discipline so far expounded:

cinmayam vyāpitaṁ sarvam ākāśam jagad-īśvaram sahitaṁ sarva-bhūtānām jīvan-muktaḥ sa ucyate

(yah jagad-īśvaram cit-svarūpaṁ iti ākāśa-vyāpinam iti sarva-bhūta-sahitaṁ ity apī jñānāti saḥ jīvan-mukta ucyate.)

'The person who understands and actually sees the supreme lord of all the world as being spirit itself which pervades all space and therefore as being given along with all creatures, the centres of activity, is one who is said to be liberated in life.'

Those that believe in the supreme lord of the universe may not know that the lord is the underlying principle of all; and in spite of their belief in a lord they may see things apart from the lord. They are therefore devoid of the knowledge of the self. But the case of the knower of the self is different. For him the reality of all, that is, lord of all, is jagad-īśvara. He actually sees that it is this reality that is actually presented to him in every case of experience but not the object of ordinary perception.

Kena-Upaniṣad presents Brahman as 'That which is presented in every case of experience or knowledge in general.'⁽¹⁰⁴⁾ The same Upaniṣad points out 'Know thou that alone to be Brahman the lord of all, but not that which is commonly supposed to be Brahman.'⁽¹⁰⁵⁾ Bhagavad-Gītā says 'He who sees me in all and sees all in me, to him I do not cease to exist and to me he does not cease to exist.'⁽¹⁰⁶⁾

The expression 'as being given along with all creatures', sahitam in this passage does not mean duality, because duality is sublated by the very context defined by the state of being liberated while alive. So this word must be taken to mean the absolute reality. A similar expression is found in the Bhagavad-Gītā: 'Those who know me to be along with the elements that are in my control and the divinities that are in my control are those that have the mind resulting from the practice of spiritual discipline, meditation and so on.'⁽¹⁰⁷⁾

XII

The next stage of the growth of discipline is:—

anādi-vartī bhūtānām jīvaḥ śivo na hanyate nir-vairaḥ sarva-bhūteṣu jīvan-muktaḥ sa ucyate

(serveṣu bhūteṣu yaḥ anādiḥ jīvaḥ saḥ śiva eva. ata eva saḥ na hanyate. ataḥ sarveṣu bhūteṣu nir-vairo yaḥ jīvan-mukta ucyate.)

'The jīva of the creatures that exist from the beginningless time is śiva himself. Jīva therefore is never destroyed. Having known this truth the person who bears no hatred to any creature is said to be liberated in life '

Hitherto, the behaviour of a person within himself in relation to himself that makes him liberated in life was expounded. In the present passage his relation to other creatures which makes him liberated in life is stated. For the reason that jīva is śiva himself, Śruti holds 'The body is the temple of the Lord.'⁽¹⁰⁸⁾ For this reason Kaṭhupanīṣad says: 'Jīva does not kill others nor is it killed by others.'⁽¹⁰⁹⁾

XIII

Lord Dattātreya teaches the two-fold relation of the self:—

ātmā guruḥ tvam viśvam ca cid-ākāśo na-lipyate gatāgataṁ dvayoḥ nāsti jīvan-muktaḥ sa ucyate

(yah guruḥ ātmā saḥ tvam eva. sa eva nir-liptaḥ cid-ākāśaḥ. tad eva sarvam ata eva tasya gatāgataṁ gataṁ āgataṁ āgataṁ gataṁ vā na vidyate. evaṁ yah ātmānam saḥ jīvan-mukta ity ucyate.)

'The self is the preceptor. It is yourself It is all this. It is the all-pervading spirit. It is never affected by anything. Jīva and śiva are thus the same. For both therefore there is no subtraction and no addition. The person who knows this truth is said to be the liberated in life'

The Sanskrit expression gatāgata also means forward and backward movement of the self from one world to the other world. When it is realised that Ātman is all, there is no meaning in attributing this movement to it Further, gatāgataṁ dvayaṁ nāsti is a possible reading of the passage. This means both gata and āgata, going and coming, are absent in the self.

XIV

Does this self continue to be individual? Lord Dattātreya says 'No.'

garbha-dhyānena paśyanti jñānināṁ mana ucyate soham mano viliyante jīvan-muktaḥ sa ucyate

(garbha-dhyānena antar-dhyānena ity arthah. etādrśa-dhyānena jñāninah yat paśyanti tad eva jñānināṁ mana ucyate idaṁ eva soham-manah etādrśa-mano-viśiṣṭāḥ jñāninah cid-ākāśa ity anuvartate tatra viliyante. te tatra vlayam yāntīty arthah. evaṁ sthitasya ātma-tattvasya jñānī ity anuvartate saḥ jīvan-mukta ity ucyate)

'By means of internal introspection that which the wise see is their mind. The same is the mind 'He I am' soham. This mind with the meditation 'He I am' is the all-pervading śiva itself. He who knows this truth is said to be liberated in life.'

This passage explains how the duality of the subjective and the objective aspects of the mind of the wise is overcome. At the stage of the meditation, 'He I am', the mind is not directed towards something which is different from it. It is rather directed towards itself. It finds itself. It is the person of this mind that disappears in the ultimate truth. The same is taught by Śruti. Advayatāraka-Upaniṣad says 'The person who always meditates on himself as being in essence spirit itself . . . by means of introspection seeing the highest Brahman becomes Brahman itself.'⁽¹¹⁰⁾ Haṁsa-Upaniṣad explains how the mind of 'He I am' soham-manas disappears in the ultimate and how finally there shines the all-auspicious as 'One ought to meditate on the self characterised as 'I am He' . . . one becomes the highest Brahman . . . It is herein the all auspicious shines.'⁽¹¹¹⁾ So the expression, destruction of mind, actually indicates the shining, prakāśana of the all-auspicious.

XV

ūrdhva-dhyānena paśyanti vijñānam mana ucyate śūnyam layam ca vilayam jīvan-muktaḥ sa ucyate

(jñāninaḥ ūrdhva-dhyānena samādhinā yat paśyanti tat vijñānam. tat teṣāṁ mana ucyate. tadeva śūnyam layam. tadeva vijñānam. tathā ātma-jñāni atmānam jānāti yaḥ saḥ jīvan-mukta ucyate.)

'By means of meditation that which the wise see is the spirit. The same is called mind, the mind of the wise. The same is called void, destruction and wholesale destruction. The knower of this truth is said to be the liberated in life.'

This passage illustrates how spirit, mind and so on stand for consciousness, and how void, śūnya, destruction, laya, and wholesale destruction, vilaya, have in view the truth of consciousness, cit. This shows how this position is profoundly different from nihilism, the state of nothing.

XVI

abhyāse ramate nityam mano dhyāna-layam gatam bandha-mokṣa-dvayam nāsti jīvan-muktaḥ sa ucyate

(yasya jñāninaḥ manaḥ nityam abhyāse śravana-manana-nididhyāsanākhyā-tapasi ramate krīdati. yasya manaḥ dhyāna-layam dhyane layam gatam; yasya bandha-mokṣa-dvayam bandha-mokṣākhyā-dvandvam nāsti saḥ jīvan-mukta ucyate.)

'He is said to be the liberated in life whose mind delights always in understanding, reflecting and meditating and is absorbed in meditation and who is free from the relative ideas of bondage and liberation '

The ideas of bondage and liberation are relative to each other. They are therefore of the character of bondage The wise man is free from them.

The idea expounded by this passage is the position established by the Upaniṣads and studied by the Smṛtis Svetāśvatara-Upaniṣad says 'The form of this truth does not belong to the world of experience by clear conception Nor does any one see it by means of the eyes Those who by means of mind understand this truth which underlies mind as such, become immortal '(112) Katha-Upaniṣad says 'It ought to be realised only by means of mind There is absolutely no distinction in it '(113) The Bhagavad-Gītā substantiates the same idea in many passages such as 'The spiritual aspirant having his mind fixed realises the truth of mine which is peace itself being the highest stage of liberation '(114)

XVII

ekāki ramate nityam svabhāva-guna-varjitam brahma-jñāna-rasāsvādī jīvan-muktah sa ucyate

(yasya jñānīnaḥ-manah ity anuvartate nityam svabhāva-guna-varjitam prakṛti-guṇātītam, saḥ jñānī ekāki ramate ātmany eva kṛṣṇati brahma-jñāna-rasāsvādī brahmākhyā-jñāna-rasāsvādī saḥ jīvan mukta ity ucyate)

'That wise (person) whose mind has transcended the properties of the root matter is absorbed in joy within himself He who is absorbed in spirit, the essence of knowledge which is Brahman Itself is said to be liberated in life '

This is the position expounded by such passages of the Upaniṣads as 'One who knows Brahman becomes Brahman itself '(115) Katha-Upaniṣad making a reference to those that know Brahman observes 'Happiness occurs only to those but not to others Peace occurs only to those but not to others '(116)

XVIII

Hṛdi dhyānena paśyanti prakāśam kriyate manah soham hamseti paśyanti jīvan-muktah sa ucyate.

(ye jñāninaḥ hṛdi dhyānena prakāśam paśyanti taiḥ manah kriyate—teṣāṁ manah abhivyaktam bhavati iti yāvat. tadā te 'soham' 'hamṣah' iti paśyanti. evaṁ ātma-tattvam paśyan jīvan-mukta ity ucyate.)

'Those wise men who by means of meditation see the illumination within themselves are those by whom mind is achieved. They then see reality as 'He I am'. He who understands the self in this manner is said to be liberated in life.'

The Haṁsa-Upaniṣad distinguishes between two forms: the individual being all, haṁsa and the transcendent being, parama-haṁsa. With reference to this knowledge it says "'He I am", haṁsa is the seer of this hymn, and the transcendent "I am he", parama-haṁsa is the truth approached by means of this knowledge.'⁽¹¹⁷⁾ By this the individual is required to transcend individuality.

XIX

śiva-śakti-samātmānam pinḍa-brahmāṇḍam eva ca cid-ākāśam hṛdam moham jīvan-muktah sa ucyate

(jñāninaḥ śiva-śakti-samātmānam śiva-śakti-samah yaḥ ātmā tam ātmānam mahātmānam. Pinḍaḥ sārīram. tena sahitaṁ brahmāṇḍam hṛdam hṛtstham bandhakam moham ca cid-ākāśam iti caitanyam eva paśyanti, yaḥ evaṁ ātma-tattva-jñānī saḥ jīvan-mukta ity ucyate.)

'The wise see that the great self which is the same as the power of the auspicious, śiva, the whole universe including the body and the delusion that pertains to his mind i.e., heart are nothing but spirit. The person who understands this truth is said to be liberated in life.'

The concept of the auspicious power, śiva-śakti, is the underlying principle of several ideas that are in vogue such as Kālidāsa's praise of pārvatī and parameśvara, 'With a view to understanding the nature of word and its meaning I offer my salutations to pārvatī and paramēśvara, the parents of the world so intimately related to each other even as word and its meaning (are related to each other).⁽¹¹⁸⁾, and the concepts, lakṣmī-nārāyaṇa, umā-maheśvara, ardha-nārīśvara, paśupati and so on. All these ideas refer to the esoteric meaning of the knowledge 'He I am', haṁsavidyā.

XX

jāgrat-svapna-suṣuptim ca turīyāvasthitam sadā soham mano vilīyeta jīvan-muktaḥ sa ucyate

(yasya jñāninah soham manah soham iti dhyānaika-param manah jāgrat-svapna-suṣuptim atītya sadā turīyāvasthitam sat cid-ākāśa-paramātmam vilīyeta sa jñānī jīvan-mukta ity ucyate.)

'The wise man whose mind constantly meditating on 'He I am', soham is fixed in the state of transcendence having transcended waking, dream and dreamless sleep and becomes dissolved in the all absorbing spirit is said to be the liberated in life '

Kaivalya-Upaniṣad expounds the same position: 'The same jīva being deluded by power, that is, illusion, māyā, obtains body and does all. At the state of waking the same jīva has satisfaction by having different pleasures, women, food, drinks, etc. The same jīva enjoys in dream, pleasure and pain in a world by themselves posited by its own power, māyā. At the time of sleep all become quiescent, jīva is obscured by darkness, tamas, and it comes to have the disposition of joy . . . the basis of all this experience is the spirit, caitanya which is partless and is of the nature of bliss; and in this spirit all the three states disappear . . . I am that Brahman that is secondless.'⁽¹¹⁹⁾ This passage explains how the individual experiences misery in the three states and the manner of overcoming it in the state of transcendence is to attain to the outlook of 'He I am', soham-bhāva.

XXI

soham sthitam jñānam idam sūtreṣu manivat param
soham brahma nirākāram jīvan-muktaḥ sa ucyate

(idam soham sthitam jñānam sūtreṣu manivat cid-ākāśe sthitam ity anvayah soham param brahma nirākāram evam ātma-jñānī yah sa jīvan-mukta ity ucyate.)

'This knowledge i.e., manas defined as 'He I am', soham, is in spirit, caitanya, even as the bead is in the string. The reality presented as 'He I am' is the highest Brahman itself. It is formless. One who knows this truth is said to be liberated in life, jīvan-mukta.'

The string (Brahman) connects the beads, (individuals) of a necklace, through 'He I am', soham. So it is the bead or seed which links us with the transcendent. The attitude of 'He I am' is our affirmation of union with the transcendent.

XXII

Lord Dattātreyā observes that at this stage of discipline there is nothing that may cause bondage.

mana eva manusyānām bhedābhedasya kāraṇam vikalpanaiva saṁkalpaṁ jīvan-muktaḥ sa ucyate

(Vikalpanā idam itthaṁ evetyādi tattva-viruddhā kalpanā sa eva saṁkalpah iti prasiddhaḥ tad eva mano-rūpaṁ sat manusyānām ahaṁ mametyādi bhedābheda-vyavahāra-kāraṇam. Evaṁ yo jñāti jñāna phalaṁ ca saṁkalpa-rāhityaṁ tathā ca yah sarvathā saṁkalpa-rahitaḥ. saḥ jīvan-mukta ity ucyate.)

'The notion of this and thus and so on is a fiction opposed to truth and that is what is commonly known as volition. It is this mental activity that is the cause in ordinary life of the distinctions of I and mine. He who is aware of this as the result of the knowledge and lack of self will become entirely free of volitional activity. Such an one is spoken of as the unfettered soul though embodied.'

This passage clearly explains how to be impressed with distinctions and differences is due to a warped outlook. It is a miasma of the mind. To yield to it is not a sign of wisdom. It is a mischief that our mind plays with us. To be aware and conscious of this mental tendency is to prevent oneself from succumbing to it. He who knows that the eternal spirit within us transcends all these transformations is a liberated soul. Muṇḍaka-Upaniṣad illustrates this point by the story of the two birds one of which looks on as a spectator while the other eats of the fruit of suffering.⁽¹²⁰⁾

XXIII

Lord Dattātreyā points out to a stage in spiritual discipline at which the promise and potency of liberation will begin to fructify.

mana eva viduḥ prājñāḥ siddha-siddhānta eva ca
sadā dṛdham tadā mokṣa jīvan-muktah sa ucyate

(yat prājñāḥ jñāninah viduḥ kīṃiti? yadā manah sadā dṛdham bhavati tadaiva mokṣah iti. Sa eva ca siddha-siddhāntah. ya evaṃ siddhāntam veda saḥ jīvan-mukta ucyate.)

'What is that which the wise and the knowing have known? It is that liberation which is the condition where the mind becomes steadfast That is the established truth He who is aware of this truth is the unfettered soul though embodied.'

Siddha-siddhānta—Dattātreyā is a siddha. He has so far taught the steps to reach siddhi, perfection. This is his established position and this is therefore called siddha-siddhānta.

XXIV

Lord Dattātreyā concludes by declaring thus:—

yogābhyāsī manaś-śreṣṭhah antas-tyāgī bahir-jadāḥ antas-tyāgī bahis-tyāgī jīvan-muktassa ucyate

(yo yo yogābhyāsī yogam abhyasati sa so manaś-śreṣṭhah-manasā śreṣṭhah evaṃ vidhah ayam antas-tyāgī antas-tham sarvam apī māyā-sambhūtam tyajati iti antas-tyāgī Ata eva saḥ bahīḥ jada-vat ācarati. evaṃca saḥ antas-tyāgī bahis-tyāgī ca.
sa eva jīvan-mukta ity ucyate.)

'Whoever practises yoga is one who has attained mental excellence. One of this type is a person of inner renunciation, called so on account of the fact that he has renounced all illusory objects.
That is the reason why outwardly he conducts himself as absolutely inert. He is thus the two-fold renouncer, both within and without.
He is spoken of as the unfettered soul though embodied.'

Patanjali-Sūtra says 'Yoga is complete cessation of the mental functions' (1:2:1)

Lord Dattātreyā the teacher of this Gītā is himself śiva. He is himself the liberated in life. He has attained this state by means of the practice of spiritual discipline. He is of supreme mind. He has transcended all that is inside and all that is outside himself. He is thus an aspirant. He is compassionate to his devotees. He is all-witnessing. He is served by the accomplished ones. He is therefore the best teacher of the spiritual discipline that makes one liberated both in this life and beyond.

Casting off false conceptions, internal (āntara) and external (bāhya), by truthful and sincere efforts we can attain to the highest that we are capable of.

Iti vedānta-kesariṇā śrī Dattātreyeṇa viracitā jīvanmukta-gītā samāptā.

‘Thus ends the song on jīvanmukta composed by Śrī Dattātreyā, the Lion of Vedānta.’

Iti Śrī Jayacāmarājendra-viracitā jīvanmukta gītā-vyākhyā samāptā.

‘Thus ends the commentary on jīvan-mukta gītā by Śrī Jayachamarajendra Wadiyar.’

2. DATTĀTREYA: THE INCARNATION

It may be appropriate here to consider the conception of the incarnation of Dattātreyā. It is said in the Upaniṣad that Dattātreyā was the gift of Lord maheśvara to the sage Atri as a result of his being pleased with his austere penance. For the reason that he was given to Atri by maheśvara he was called Dattātreyā. Dattātreyā, it further says, is the Lord maheśvara who was born as Atri’s son.

In the purāṇic version the story is slightly different. There it is said that Atri went to perform a sacrifice, yajña, leaving his dear wife Anasūyā to be in charge of his hermitage, āśrama. Anasūyā who is a chaste and devoted wife begs Atri, her Lord, to give her permission to keep the sacred water (tīrtha) after washing his feet. With his consent she agrees to look after the guests and conduct the daily ritual. Her fame was so wide and well known that Nārada, the celestial musician and divine sage taunts the wives of the trinity of Gods, brahmā, viṣṇu and rudra that even they cannot hold a candle against Anasūyā’s devotion to her husband. The three spouses of the trinity of Gods grow jealous and prevail on their husbands to go and besmirch the fair name of Anasūyā. Accordingly the three Gods, brahmā, viṣṇu and maheśvara go there as three brahmins and ask to be entertained. When the offering of food is placed before them they refuse to eat it. Anasūyā is worried lest her piety towards guests be in question. So she entreats them to say what they want. They reply by saying that unless she serves their food without any garment on herself, they will not eat their fill. Anasūyā having thought over it for a minute agrees to do so and taking the holy water that had washed her husband's feet, sprinkles it on the three guests who are turned into babies. They are fondly suckled by her and given their food. In the meantime Nārada tells Atri that his wife has been unfaithful, and has three babies. The sage Atri returns home in a rage, but on learning the truth is much pleased with Anasūyā's devotion and fidelity.

After the lapse of a long time, the three wives of the trinity get upset because their husbands have not yet returned from their errands and ask Nārada for information. Nārada tells them what has happened. The wives ask Anasūyā for the return of their husbands and they are restored to them. All of them being satisfied with the penance of Atri and the devotion of his wife, grant them boons. Whereupon Atri and his wife ask that the three Gods be born as their sons. The wish is readily granted and so resulting in the birth of soma with brahmā's blessings, durvāsa with śiva's blessings and Dattātreyā with viṣṇu's blessings, but Dattātreyā incorporates within himself all the attributes of the Trinity. So it came about that Dattātreyā was the special incarnation of the three Gods in recognition of the penance of Atri and chastity of Anasūyā.* The date of the incarnation is said to be Wednesday, the fourteenth day of the full moon in the month of mārgaśīrsa.

Thus Śrī Dattātreyā occupies a very special position in Indian mythology. He is not merely a symbol but a great living and ever auspicious presence. He is known as a devoted son to his parents, as an exemplary ascetic, a great teacher of śākta and śaiva doctrines as evidenced in Tripurā-Rahasya, Devī Bhāgavata, the Avadhūta-Gītā and Śiva-Rahasya. He is the preceptor of Paraśurāma and Saṃkṛti. He is one of those that were liberated though living. He is known as 'Dattātreyā the highest and beyond all measure.'⁽¹²²⁾

In the Tripurā-Rahasya Dattātreyā is depicted as the one who is outwardly fond of wine and women. It is said that it is a cloak to hide his greatness, because he was tired of being harassed by people of all sorts for the highest truth. Nobody knew better than the Lord that no one who was not an adhikārī, responsible person, should be initiated into the secret of the science of Brahman. So he repelled all those not worth teaching, from coming to him. It was only the true

* There is a temple in Travancore State built where the trinity of Gods revealed themselves to Atri and his wife—at the place called Sucindram. In passing it may be noted that, within that temple there is a shrine dedicated to Śrī Dattātreyā.

aspirant, the disciple with real devotion that would see, through his spiritual power, and thus would be ready to receive his grace and blessing. Such a great devotee of Śrī Dattātreyā was Paraśurāmā. After testing his sincerity, Dattātreyā initiated him into the secret of Tripurā. Paraśurāmā owed his inspiration to worship at the feet of the Lord Dattātreyā to the sage saṁvarta.

Dattātreyā was also the teacher and guide of the legendary hero Kārtavīryārjuna, the great kṣatriya king. It was Kārtavīryārjuna whom Paraśurāmā defeated and destroyed in his attempt to rid the world of all kṣatriya kings. Both these great men, great heroes and great ascetics, sādhakas, were the disciples of Lord Dattātreyā. So much for the greatness of Dattātreyā as a preceptor, guru.

There is a belief widely held that Dattātreyā also took the form of Śrīpāda-vallabha and Śrī Narasimha-sarasvati, two great spiritual guides whose disciples exist even today. Their many sportive activities (līlas) and miraculous doings excite the admiration and enhance the devotion in many of the Lord's devotees, as well as help to enhance the Lord's radiance and glory further. In both these incarnations Dattātreyā is always the philosopher completely detached from the worldly things, the embodiment of renunciation, true wisdom, universal kindness and enormous spiritual and miraculous powers. These great souls were ever bent on giving succour to suffering humanity, always ready and willing to help sincere men in their ordinary existence into a higher plane of spiritual and moral grandeur, to enable them to achieve the highest end or goal of life, the state of being liberated in life, jīvanmuktatva, through the enjoyment of the nectar of identity, advaitāmṛta, as the result of the grace of God, īśvarānugraha, helping to develop the individual disposition, saṁskāra, into complete fruition by the development of the intuitive faculty, pratibhā-śakti. Thus were the great preceptors, Śrī Śrīpāda-vallabha and Śrī Narasimha-sarasvati, the incarnations of the Lord Dattātreyā, the embodiments of all that is highest in Indian thought and culture. They were the Lord in human form, the preceptors who illumined the dark world of dreariness and unwholesomeness by their wisdom, piety and truth. They were no other than Brahman characterised as truth, wisdom and the ever present, that is, the eternal presence.

Dattātreyā is a sacred name and a symbol of the sacred 'I'. He is the vital principle we call by various names, śiva, viṣṇu, rudra, brahmā, vāyu, prthivī, indra and so on. He is all of them; he is in every particle of thought, action and belief. He is the preceptor who confers the nectar of unity, advaitāmṛta by his mere glance.

To him, Lord Dattātreya, all his devotees turn for protection and guidance. And his presence is felt by all who have that faith and love. May he watch over us, and bless us with the realisation of identity which is the grace of God. As Puspadanta says of the Lord, his grace is enough to give the pupil the boon of the nectar of identity. All paths lead to him alone.

'If the praise of thee by one who is ignorant of the extent of thy greatness be unbecoming, then the praises of even Brahmā and others are inadequate for thee. And if all remain unblameable by praising thee according to their intellectual powers, then even this attempt on my part to compose a hymn is free from any blemish' (123)

'O Dattātreya! O hari! O kṛṣṇa!
 O the Giver of the Highest Bliss!
 O the Form covering all the directions of space!
 O the child of Atri!
 (O the product of the men of wisdom!)
 O the demon!
 O the Ocean of Knowledge!' (124)

Aum śāntiḥ śāntiḥ śāntiḥ

CONCLUSION

By way of concluding this part of the work, the significant ideas that were so far expounded may be recapitulated so as to present to our mind a coherent view of the reality, Dattātreya, with a view to understanding the truth of identity more readily.

Identity is the truth that underlies life as such. To understand it presupposes a disposition. This disposition is the gift of the Lord. Without it life is embodied in misery and is meaningless. With it it is joy itself and meaningful. It results in the realisation of identity. This is the state of release from bondage, the state of pristine freedom. The outlook of identity gives a purpose to life. It integrates it with the transcendent.

The process of realisation involves a systematic spiritual development which is accelerated at each stage by the spontaneous grace of God. The flowering and the fruition of this process of growth consist in the acquisition of Advaita bhāva or the Advaita attitude. This frame of mind comes to permeate every phase of a person's activity and enables him to steer clear of illusions and delusions, passions and prejudices. It enables him to overcome adverse circumstances of all kinds. It secures for him a serenity of spirit, an equanimity of mind, and an egalitarian outlook (samadr̥ṣṭi) which is the outward expression of an inner tranquillity, realisation and poise.

In the language of Śāṇḍilya-Upaniṣad, identity, Advaita, is the implication of the Dattātreyā concept. The concept of Dattātreyā is so complete and comprehensive that it is not the object of study and knowledge. It is the very principle of study and knowledge. For this reason it is meditated upon as 'Śiva I am' and 'Dattātreyā I am'. It is thus the preceptor of all. It is spirit. It is illumination. It is self-revealed, self-understood and self-established. In this process it happens to be the preceptor of liberation in life and the philosophy of equipoise. As identical with dakṣiṇāmūrti it is the source of an unbroken stream of teachers and teaching (gurusampradāya pravāha). It is the oneness of upāsana and upāsya—both the process of meditation and the object meditated upon.

The things that appear contrary to this identity have their source in nescience and illusion. They are instances of witchery created by Dattātreyā, the master magician. Dattātreyā creates circumstances that make practice of meditation a necessity. Meditation implies one who meditates. The meditator in his effort to become one with the meditated is chastened and purged of all taint of evil and imperfection. The process of meditation culminates in the direct realisation of that which is meditated. This is the consummation devoutly to be wished for, the realisation in the most intense way of a unity in the midst of diversity. The truth that is thus realised is the monistic truth expounded by the scriptures. This is in short the subject matter of the present work.

In the first chapter of this book we attempted to understand identity by means of several definitions offered by men of wisdom. Further, in the light of Śāṇḍilya-Upaniṣad we noted that the truth of identity is the origin and the aim of the whole creation. To indicate the rich content of this truth it was signified as Dattātreyā by this Upaniṣad.

In the second chapter of this work we studied the concept of Dattātreyā as presented by the same Upaniṣad. The several attributes like śāntam, the peaceful and śivam, the good ascribed to Dattātreyā should not be taken as in any manner giving a description of it. Description presupposes a familiarity with a thing and its features. This cannot be said of our knowledge of ultimate reality. It baffles description and definition. One can arrive at a theoretical understanding of it (śabdabrahma) by a process of disciplined thinking. But this is only preliminary to realisation. This holds good of the truths revealed in the Veda. The attributes mentioned are however so bound together that each of them is logically integrated with the others. They are interrelated and interlocking and find their solidarity and transcendence in the absolute. The principle that all determination is negation was adverted to in this part of the work.

At this stage of our study the question of interpretation becomes very important. This may be illustrated by taking for example Dattātreyā as identity. As identity, Dattātreyā was said to be truth, sat, knowledge, cit and bliss, ānanda, Brahman, Ātman and maheśvara. This signifies that whenever the concept of Dattātreyā comes to our mind, we must see that in the same concept all that is signified by these Upaniṣadic words must be truly represented. These words are also used in common parlance. They are supposed to have a definite meaning according to ordinary usage. But the Upaniṣadic use of these words is profoundly different. A reference to the Upaniṣadic literature shows that each word is applied with great care to a definite position at which the Upaniṣadic seer has arrived after deep meditation under the personal guidance of an expert teacher. A reference to the Taittirīya-Upaniṣad illustrates this point further.

Bhṛguvalli, the concluding part of this Upaniṣad opens 'Bhṛgu the celebrated son of Varuna came to Varuna, his father and requested him 'O Revered Sir! Teach me Brahman'. He taught him the following' (Brahman is) food, vital breath, eye, ear, mind and speech. He further taught him, 'from which these creatures are born, by which those that are born are supported, into which they enter and become united, enquire into it. That is Brahman'. He meditated upon it. Having meditated upon it, he understood that food is Brahman. From food these creatures are born. By food those that are born are supported. They enter into food and become united with it. Having understood this, he again came to Varuna, his father and said to him. 'O Revered Sir! teach me Brahman'. He taught him, 'Enquire into that from which all things have emanated, by which all things are sustained and into which all things return'.⁽¹²⁵⁾

We are herein told that under the guidance and direction of Varuna, the father and teacher, the pupil and son Bhṛgu was led by gradual stages of reflection to the comprehension of Brahman. The process of meditation which led to this is essentially enquiry and reflection culminating in the harmonisation of all the vedic texts and ideas in such a way that they receive invincible philosophical justification.

In order to understand an Upaniṣadic idea or a word, the relevant Vedic passages must be scrutinised and the meanings have to be fixed. Any other method of interpreting it does not do justice to it. The problems connected with this aspect of interpretation are the subject matter of the Vedānta-Sūtras of Bādarāyaṇa.

In the present work an attempt is made to interpret the attributes of Dattātreyā in terms of the Vedic ideas. For the sake of clearness an attempt is made in the following pages to show how these various terms point to the same truth and how each idea is implied in all other ideas. This may now be briefly indicated.

As it is already suggested, Dattātreyā is the Absolute and the one and emphatically non-dual. This is the implication of the Upaniṣadic definition of Dattātreyā as truth, sat, knowledge, cit, bliss, ānanda, Brahman, Ātman and maheśvara. Duality is only a phase in this process of understanding. By deep austerity and meditation it disappears. The annulment of duality characterises the Advaitic experience. This is the experience of the holy (śivam). It is the 'numinous' experience as Professor Rudolf Otto puts it. The holy is the tranquil (śāntam). It is a peace that passeth understanding. The holy and the tranquil is the harmonious and harmony evokes the aesthetic experience of the beautiful (sundaram). 'Indranīlasamāprabha', 'luminous like a sapphire', signifies the soundarya aspect. 'Dvaita' or the duality of the experiencer and the experienced has 'advaita' implicit in it. It is a necessary stepping-stone to Advaitic experience. The manifested and the manifold universe is the effervescence of the inherent bliss of the Absolute (Ānanda). The Upaniṣad says that from bliss everything emanates and into bliss every thing returns. The effervescing of ānanda in the manifested universe is termed the creative play (Līla) of the Divine spirit. Dualism therefore presupposes identity. It is therefore not ultimate. The ultimate is identity. Dattātreyā transcending duality of all kinds is the one source of all that is verily defined as omnipotent. The extension of its omnipotence is so great that its creative power knows no bounds. It is a system-maker as well as a great magician. In both cases its creation is a spontaneity. It is its sport. It is the overflow of its bliss. It is in this sense intent on unravelling its power. It is thus the author, of both bondage and release. Its creatorship involves no duality. Everything emanates from it and finally enters into it. It is in this sense the shining principle of all.

Truth is like a many-sided gem, the particular facets revealed being parts of the gem. Likewise we can say that truth is like a hill which is visible to view. Only a part of it can be glimpsed. This does not mean that what is not known does not exist or that what is grasped is the whole hill. What is grasped by each perspective is part of the hill, and the other unseen parts are mentally fitted up by us by a process of what a psychologist has termed 'noetic synthesis'. Similarly it is the case with the highest truth. The transcendent is implied though only a part of it is being discovered by us. The ordinarily comprehensible portion of it consists of those attributes by which we term Dattātreyā as auspicious, peaceful and so on. But the whole reality of Dattātreyā transcends all that. It is self-illuminating, self-illuminated and self-illumination. This is what Deva as applied to Dattātreyā implies. 'Deva' is derived from 'div' which etymologically means 'to shine'.

The real truth of Dattātreyā cannot be revealed by word of mouth nor is there anything in the light of which it can be grasped. It is presupposed in all knowledge and is svaprakāśa or self-evident. It is the teacher itself. The only way by which it can be known is by a process of immediate knowledge or direct realisation (śaksātkāra). It is then that it reveals itself as the one and one only (advaita). It is avadhūta in the sense that it stands unveiled in its unwrapped spotless purity (digambara). It is the very perfection of all spiritual discipline.

It therefore needs no protection. It is its own protection. It is for this reason characterised as having the cardinal directions as its garment. This word signifies absolute absence of protection. At the same time it implies that it is the one protection of all. It is not only that which has all directions as its garment but it is the garment of all directions.

All this illustrates how Dattātreyā is all that is holy and all that is denoted by energy. It is holy energy (śiva-śakti), the white heat energy that scorches all evil to ashes with which the body beautiful of Dattātreyā is smeared. This is what is signified as bhasmoddhūlita-sarrāṅgam (Ashes) 'Bhasma' is the language of auspicious power. (Ashes) Bhasma also signifies the truth of identity. Brhajābāla-Upaniṣad says 'Śiva in the upsurge aspect is śakti itself. The upsurging śakti is śiva himself. There is thus nothing in the world that is not permeated by śiva-śakti. Again and again this world is burnt to ashes by agni. They call the ashes bhasma, the power of agni. So is bhasma the power of agni. That is what they say.'⁽¹²⁶⁾ Bhasma signifies the truth of Advaita wherein all that is diverse is forged into a unity, all that is evil is scorched to ashes and all that is existent is fused into a single seamless reality apart from which nothing else exists.

Dattātreyā is thus all that is knowledge, reflection, meditation, all that is austerity, all that is spiritual and all that is discipline. This explains how it is most supreme. For this reason It is described as 'having the lock of hair reposing high on its head', 'Jaṭājūṭadhara' as an appellation of Dattātreyā must now receive our attention. The top-knot of braided hair (jaṭājūṭa) is indicative of penance and austerity of discipline. It is also indicative of the tangled world of existence braided together reaching an apex of a pyramidal reality. It is the inner meaning and special significance that entitle this literature to be regarded as a pramāṇa or authentic source of knowledge of ultimate reality. We have to understand its special significance and circumstance on the strength of which alone it is considered to be the only source of knowledge of the ultimate truth, Dattātreyā. The truth of all these ideas can be appreciated only by those that have the eye of knowledge, the inner eye. Arjuna was vouchsafed with this 'divya cakṣus', the divine eye, with which he was able to see the vision of the cosmic form of the lord. It gave him the vision of the cosmic form. For this reason Dattātreyā is defined as having absolute purity, omnipresence, all-pervadingness, the source of all manifestations of might or power (vibhūti).

Dattātreyā is thus the repository of all power. Power implies a personality charged with it. It is an embodiment and medium of expression. It is this embodied manifestation of power that is characterised by words like 'caturbāhu' and 'udārāṅga'. The expansiveness and all inclusiveness of this personality that is indicated by the description 'four-armed'. The words indicate strength and beauty. The efflorescence of this beauty is indicated by the figure of a fully-blossomed lotus. The whole idea is that truth and beauty go together. To separate them gives no meaning. Philosophy and aesthetics together give life a purpose and meaning. Divorced from each other they degenerate into sophistry or vulgarity. Therefore our ancients laid stress on the interlinking connection between the meaning and purpose of philosophy and aesthetics. This explains how personality illustrates the absolute truth, clarifying how the whole (sakala) and the part are aspects (vikala) of the one Reality. This ontological unity is the essential nature of Dattātreyā.

Dattātreyā is both perfection and the discipline leading to perfection. It is the treasure-house of knowledge and discipline, the rich embodiment of jñāna and yoga. This is the expression of the unity of all. This is the identity of truth, beauty and goodness. This is equally the implication of the identity of the all-inclusive and all-exclusive aspects of Reality.

It is the truth that can be the source of knowledge from which everything else is derived. Dattātreyā is the light that illumines all, that is present in all. It is therefore the preceptor of all. It is the one reality to which all sacredness belongs. It is the one aim of all discipline both as an ideal aspect of discipline, and as the ideal to be realised by means of the discipline. For this reason it is the beloved of all classes of aspirants. Without this ideal no discipline is possible. Discipline without this ideal is only a waste of energy and time.

To attain to this stage of thought is not exclusively a matter of personal endeavour. Even the impulse to achieve this is to be ascribed to the almighty Dattātreyā. Nothing else can be postulated as an agency to effect this transformation. This would be tantamount to lapsing to dualism which militates against the Absoluteness (Advaita) of Dattātreyā. Dualism would mean setting over some reality against identity, that is, Dattātreyā. It is therefore to negate Dattātreyā. But Dattātreyā is the real. It is the principle of negation also. Hence man has no power against it. Having a power in addition to it and along with it is to modify and deny it. Hence the power in question is the work of Dattātreyā. Its work is its grace. It is therefore defined as being compassionate to its devotees. This signifies devotion to it. The devotees and all the circumstances connected with them are equally its work and that is the nature of grace or compassion.

What is called the grace of the Lord at the opening passage of this work is indeed the grace of Dattātreyā. It is not attained by any prayer. Before grace there is no knowledge of Dattātreyā. Under this condition to whom are we to pray? Our prayer prior to the knowledge of it is aimless and therefore meaningless. After knowledge there is no place for prayer because knowledge itself takes the place of prayer. Knowledge in its true sense is meditation itself and meditation that is not knowledge is meaningless. So grace is not the work of the devotee or student. It is the work of the Lord Dattātreyā. The individual self is not in a position to know what it is, when it comes and what its work is. It is Dattātreyā of its own accord that gives it. It knows best all about it. For this reason it is called the all-witnessing principle. The individual self at the point of receiving grace is endowed with a preparedness. This preparedness consists in being entirely free from pre-possessions, the true meaning of detachment. At this state, the individual self has nothing else to serve. It has in fact nothing else to serve throughout the course of discipline whatever realisations or perfection it may come to have. Its only object of service or devotion is Dattātreyā. Dattātreyā for this reason is served by men who are the accomplished ones.

The meditation on Dattātreyā which is thus purely intellectual in character concludes with a re-affirmation that this meditation on the highest of all that is divine, a meditation absolutely without break is the expression of the untainted purity of the aspirant who as a result of this attains the summum bonum of existence, that is, Dattātreyā. This is the essence of the Upaniṣadic teaching as such and thereby indicates that this can be understood only in the light of Vedic teaching.

The interpretation of the attributes of Dattātreyā is by no means exhaustive. The whole attempt indicates only a possible method of interpretation. Further in the course of this text certain details connected with the meditation of Dattātreyā are considered. Meditation is the outcome of the implication of the definition of Dattātreyā. Each attribute of Dattātreyā does no doubt define Dattātreyā, the undefined. The passages from the Triṣurā-Rahasya quoted in Chapter I of this work showed how the real wisdom of knowing the unknown required insight and intuition. Dattātreyā is no other than tripurā. It is the unknown and the unknowable. Philosophically to attain this conclusion is the aim of this humble work. Wisdom is required to realise the unknown as unknown. Not to know Dattātreyā is not to know it as unknown. To know it as unknown is knowledge. To do this, philosophy is required. To overcome this seeming contradiction is what is expected from the study of philosophy, Brahma-Vidyā. It is the process of understanding the Upaniṣadic statement 'To him to whom it is not known to him alone it is known.'⁽¹²⁷⁾ Further, Dattātreyā is a great magician! It is more than a magician. A Magician requires something as the basis for his magic, but Dattātreyā requires nothing. Its power is so great that it is everything. It becomes everything. It is all inclusive. It is all exclusive. It is all. It is the God, absolute. It is at the same time, a person, a man. It is the teacher of its own truth. It is the gift that Atri and Anasūyā received. It is the gift because it is the all-auspicious. It is invoked as the doer of everything in the chain formula. Apart from it there is nothing in the world that does anything. It is the five-faced Lord of all. It is the repository of all-power and as such it is the subject matter of the whole Veda.

The essence of everything in the world is Dattātreyā. Nothing is therefore greater or smaller. The entities that are consistent with the attributes of Dattātreyā are the contents of the world. To reflect about them and repose on them takes us to the highest truth, Dattātreyā. Reflect on the auspicious. You arrive at Dattātreyā as the only auspicious verity. Who can teach this truth? Dattātreyā itself. What it teaches has immediate effect on the person who understands it. It is therefore the teacher of Jīvanmukta-Gītā. It is the discipline as well as the one who practises the discipline. It is the philosopher, one who has realised himself.

'Kind, harmless, the most enduring of all beings, of the essence of truth, of a sinless disposition, unaffected, doing good to all. This is the character of the philosopher, avadhūta. '(128)

The spiritual, ethical and social importance of the concept of the philosopher, avadhūta, cannot be overestimated.

AUM

CHAPTER IV

DATTĀTREYA: THE PHILOSOPHER (Avadhūta):

I. THE PRESUPPOSITION OF DATTĀDVAITA: THE PHILOSOPHY OF THE AVADHUTA-GĪTĀ

THE Avadhūta-Gītā presupposes a knowledge of the Veda and the Upaniṣads. It is in fact a faithful exposition of the Vedic and Upaniṣadic thought. It is therefore most advanced in the disposition of its philosophical enquiry, metaphysical views and spiritual meanings. The words in it may appear to be simple at first sight. The ideas may appear to be trite or didactic. But serious thought about the background of the Vedic and Upaniṣadic teachings leads us on to the knowledge that the words of this great work are not only symbols of profound ideas but of hallowed experiences which echo down the ages the very essence of Vedic and Upaniṣadic thought. The following few thoughts therefore are just an attempt in the direction of illustrating this truth.

The Avadhūta-Gītā in its composition resembles the Bhagavad-Gītā. In its character it is an exposition of Brahma-Vidyā in the same manner as the Bhagavad-Gītā. As the author of the Bhagavad-Gītā is Lord Kṛṣṇa, the author of the Avadhūta-Gītā is Lord Dattātreya. Both these works are signified as Gītā or song. They are celestial songs communicating comfort and wisdom to suffering humanity. The subject matter of one is Bhagavān and of the other avadhūta. In the light of the foregoing considerations these two expressions are inter-changeable. One means the other. One is the explanation of the other. Bhaga (in bhagavān) means omnipotence, aiśvarya. Avadhūta explains how it is omnipotence. Both envisage all-power, sarva-śakti. Hence all-power or sarva-śakti, omnipotence is the source of both the works. Both are expositions of the Vedic truth called Brahman. An attempt is made to show how this work is in spirit identical with Śruti and Smṛti and how its chief contribution lies in its explication of sarva-śakti (omnipotence) and pūrṇatva (fullness) concepts in the

The Lord presents himself to us as Dattātreyā. His grace is nothing but his desire. It is the one source of all reality. The Māṇḍūkya says: 'The Lord's creation is but the expression of his wish.'⁽¹³²⁾ Reality is in its essence the state of freedom, freedom from bondage. It is the state of union with Brahman. This union is a matter of realisation. The particular disposition leading to this realisation is the disposition of identity. It is the gift of the Lord as the Bhagavad-Gītā says 'Through my grace you transcend bondage.'⁽¹³³⁾

The one to whom the grace occurs is defined as man, pumān, and the man of discrimination, vipra. The literal meaning of pumān is a person. In the present context the person is specified by the grace of the Lord and the disposition of identity. The Upaniṣads call a person specified similarly, the one who is undaunted and undefied, dhīra. He is undaunted. He bravely faces every situation however adverse it may appear to be. He is undefied. Nothing in the world, however exceptional is able to defy him. Kaṭha says 'Having understood the all-including the all-pervading self, a person becomes undaunted and undefied, dhīra and transcends misery.'⁽¹³⁴⁾ So man, pumān, in the present context signifies the Upaniṣadic undaunted and undefied dhīra. Vipra signifies discrimination, medhā, the state of being a medhāvin, one who has all the attainments of intellect. 'Vipra' in the vedic sense means the 'inwardly stirred'. He is the seer, who knows from within, the wise and the sagacious. His wisdom is prior to advaita vāsanā, the fragrance of non-duality. In the words of the Muṇḍaka-Upaniṣad it consists 'in having the equanimity of the mind, self-control, endurance, peace, the realisation of the self-establishing nature of self, in having examined and concluded that the whole world is the work of action, karman, in being one who is devoted to Brahman, having detachment from all things that are worldly and in going to a spiritual preceptor in order to receive knowledge.'⁽¹³⁵⁾ 'Tranquil, subdued, patient, inwardly turned, he sees the Ātman in himself, perceiving the world-process as the result of deeds and devoting himself to Brahman.' Indeed the person who has these qualities is the man of discrimination, and he is a person specified as undefied, implying that others are persons only in name, that is, they are not undefied and they do not transcend misery.

In the light of the context quoted above it is evident that the attainment of these qualities is the result of the Lord's grace. This is to say that the whole circumstance of the man of discrimination having the disposition of identity is the result of Dattātreyā's grace.

With the disposition of identity the person transcends bondage which is nothing but misery and pain, life and death, birth and rebirth. The state of transcendence is liberation. It is the state of spiritual bliss. It is freedom.

What is identity, the disposition of which brings about liberation? Dattātreya answers 'That by which all this is filled up is the Self. By the same self it (all this) is created and in the same it exists. How indeed can I pay my salutation to that which is formless, non-dual, auspicious and inexhaustible?'⁽¹³⁶⁾ As the origin and goal of all, the Lord defined as self in the present passage is complete. It is therefore self-established. To give it a form is to limit it. But it is beyond limit. It is therefore formless. Nothing is outside it. It is all-identity. There is therefore nothing to modify or destroy it. It is imperishable. Being evidently free from all limitations, pain and evil of every kind, it is the auspicious. It is beyond worship, because there is no worshipper outside it. Union is an experience, complete and final.

What is the status of the world which appears differently from the self? Dattātreya says in answer

'The whole universe is nothing but the five elements. It is similar to the water superimposed on the rays of the sun. To whom indeed shall I pay my salutation? I am the only being that is defectless.'⁽¹³⁷⁾ The world is of the earth, fire, water, air and ether. It is only an appearance like the water in a mirage. It is not a reality. What forms the self of an individual being is therefore reality. Reality is the Lord, the Self or Dattātreya. It is defectless identity. There is therefore nothing other than itself as the object of its worship. From the fact that truth is defectless identity it follows that the world as being different from the self and as being defective is superimposed even as the water on the rays of the sun.

The significance of defining the Lord as self is profound. It removes everything relative from the truth. Difference, non-difference, existence and non-existence are all relative. Each implies the other. They never represent the truth completely. So even to present identity as non-duality and so on as has been done in the course of the present exposition is only a way of expression. It is never intended to minimise the absolute character of the truth defined as identity. An appreciation of this is observed by the author to result in wonder.

In all these contexts the author is illustrating the profound significance of Vedic ideas. The Katha-Upaniṣad observes 'He who expounds this truth is a wonder by himself.'⁽¹³⁸⁾ After this Upaniṣad

the Bhagavad-Gītā says 'A person who has realised the truth sees it as wonder.'⁽¹³⁰⁾ Knowledge of the truth becomes wonder and wonder is the absorbing character of bliss. This is a circumstance in which both the realiser and the realised become wonder. The whole idea signifies that the knowledge of the truth must be a case of bliss. It can be bliss in the sense of transcendent reality only if it results in wonder. This is how knowledge of truth results in liberation which the author defines as equipose, the quintessence of harmony.

II. THE DEFECTS OF EMPIRICAL PHILOSOPHY

In this context a word about the method adopted in developing the philosophy of Avadhūta-Gītā may be mentioned. In the modern way of thinking we are not expected to lay emphasis on verbal testimony, śabda-pramāṇa. But to do full justice to the subject on hand we have all along been faithfully following the Indian mode of thinking. A note on the whole course of the Darśana literature in its development does not fail to give us an idea of how verbal testimony as a source of correct knowledge gains more and more importance. We may distinguish four stages in the growth of this importance. In the first stage verbal testimony is recognised to be one of the sources. This is the Nyāya stage of thought. In the second stage particular aspects of verbal testimony are considered to be more decisive than the other sources of knowledge, perception and so on. This is the Sāṅkhya stage of thought. The third is the Mīmāṃsā stage. In this stage particular aspect of verbal testimony is recognised to sublate all other sources of knowledge including other aspects of verbal testimony. The exclusive importance given to verbal testimony finds its culmination at the final stage of Vedānta thought and in this stage only an aspect of verbal testimony becomes the only source of correct knowledge. A careful analysis of verbal testimony has led the Vedānta thinkers to accept the conception of a case of verbal testimony which is identified as impersonal that, having no person as its origin and defined for this reason as Veda.

In India from the very commencement of philosophical thought it is Veda that has given rise to the philosophical problems and it is the interpretation of Veda that has solved those problems. So from the Indian point of view philosophy without verbal testimony in the form of Veda is inconceivable. Even though Veda is not recognised in philosophies such as the cārvāka system, the mere rejection of the Veda has occupied much space and the verbal exposition of this rejection is taken to be the highest source of knowledge. This is in a sense an indirect recognition of the importance of Veda. From this point of view it may be said that the whole of Indian thought is primarily devoted to the establishment of Veda and its importance against all that is empirical.

Further, even including cārvāka, all philosophical systems of India are called darśanas. Darśana means vision. In calling a philosophical system vision, the idea implied is that the immediate apprehension of the truth that has occurred to the originator of the system in question is the origin of the exposition of the system. This exposition can only take place through verbal testimony. This realisation led thinkers to the evaluation of verbal testimony and the veracity of its speaker. This gave rise to the concept of a reliable teacher (āpta), of the truth.

So there are two senses in which the expression, verbal testimony, is used in Indian thought—the expression as impersonal and the expression coming from a reliable person. Both are indispensable as we are to understand the unseen with the help of a preceptor. The addition or recognition of verbal testimony as an important source of knowledge has given to Indian thought a special disposition. If this is in any manner ignored, then justice to Indian thought is not done at all.

So the circumstance that applies to modern thought does not apply to Indian thought and the demands of Indian thought, if at all they can be satisfied, are satisfied only through the Indian method of interpreting our own ideas. So in the following exposition emphasis is laid on the traditional way of expounding Indian philosophy.

Further, the field of experience examined in Indian thought is very extensive. In modern thought we are familiar with the consideration of two states of an individual life, the waking and the dreaming. The state of deep sleep which is common to all living beings and the transcendent state called turiyāvasthā which is the special privilege of some spiritually gifted persons have not received the recognition they deserve in modern psychology. At times there is in modern thought the semblance of these enquiries. But it only shows how imperative the examination of these states is. Indian thought gives equal attention to all these states. A study of these states therefore demands exclusive attention at some stage or the other to all facts connected with these states. Answering this demand is possible only if our philosophic enquiry follows the Indian tradition. Further, reference to all these ideas gives altogether a different trend to philosophy. For this reason it becomes very difficult to deal with modern thought along with traditional lines and in the case of philosophies not being en rapport it is not possible for one to be compared and contrasted with the other. The considerations that we have weighed at the opening pages of this work only show the all-pervading and indispensable character of the Indian mode of thinking.

With these preliminary remarks we may continue the study of the Avadhūta-Gītā. We have so far made ourselves familiar with the position expounded by the first four verses of this work.

At this stage it is necessary seriously to reflect on the foregoing ideas because the concepts made use of are beyond the scope of ordinary human understanding. The grace of God, for instance, is not a matter of common experience. Similarly, the concepts of identity, self and so on are not gained in experience like the entities presented by the different sense organs. If a person whose life is confined to sense-experience were to make pronouncements about these great concepts, he is making statements about things which he himself does not know. If he happens to be a philosopher, however sincere and serious he may be, however scholarly he is known to be, he is after all saying things about something he has not directly experienced. These concepts and the words that represent them may mean something to a person who knows these truths personally. But to the philosopher in question they mean practically nothing. If these concepts and words are correctly understood they may no doubt be taken to mean a reference to things beyond the empirical. But with all our assertions do they take us beyond? It is evident that no one is really able to say 'yes' in reply.

If we can appreciate the significance of these ideas, it becomes evident to our mind that all philosophies which have their support in what we call normal experience suffer from the same defect. Some of them may appear to be great and exceptional. This is because of their careful analysis of some conditions which go by the name 'spiritual'. In this respect they resemble physical sciences and they deserve the respect that must be given to the sciences. But their main purpose is not this. They intend to give clear ideas about the concepts transcendental in character. But because of their empirical disposition they are unable to do this. They are unable even to comprehend what transcendence is. At any rate what the Indian method of thinking presents as transcendence is beyond their reach. Illustration of this truth is not rare in this work.

Further these empirical philosophies have no right even to make use of the concepts which they somehow call transcendent. In dealing with these concepts they must either assert their reality or negate them. But to do both they have no basis. There is as much responsibility involved in negating them as there is in asserting their reality. There must be sufficient justification to do either. When their method is empirical through and through and they cannot speak of the transcendent on legitimate grounds, how can they assert or deny it. How can they even conclude that they must remain silent? Any decision in answering these queries is after all a decision pertaining to the subject matter transcendent in character and the philosophies in question have no right to entertain it.

To speak of these defects of empirical philosophies is not to say that philosophy has no reference to life. Life in this connection is not intended to mean the empirical—laukika—character of life. To help this life no philosophy is needed. Empirically successful people are no philosophers and the so called philosophers are generally taken to be day-dreamers. There is the common saying 'philosophy bakes no bread.'

When it is said that philosophy must have a reference to life, the intended meaning of the word life is spiritual life. Philosophy must lead to the elevation of life. The empirical conditions of life must be transcended. What life cannot achieve with all the empirical equipment must be achieved without fail with the help of philosophy. This philosophy is therefore something totally different from all that is empirical. One sure test of the correctness of philosophy is this. Supposing that philosophy is absent, what does man lose? 'Nothing' is the only answer, because this philosophy teaches nothing new. But if the philosophy that deals with the truth of life and existence is really possible, then it is evidently indispensable, because without it life is blind and existence is in danger. Without it life is like a machine driven by a man who is entirely ignorant of it. So in the light of these considerations we have arrived at a definition of philosophy. A legitimate philosophy is that which has a reference to life and which deals with the truth of life and existence. Shorn of its relation to well-being and truth of life, philosophy becomes sophistry. The spirit of this discussion is not unknown to modern thought. A reference to the history of European philosophy reveals the fact that from the time of Parmenides down to the present time empiricism of all kinds is condemned and inner vision to reveal Truth is sought for. The nous of the Greek philosophy and intuition of modern thought indicate how there is a consistent effort to transcend the empirical level throughout the history of thinking of the western world.

III. TRUTH IS TRANSCENDENT

The truth of life and existence is necessarily transcendent. The process of understanding it is what may be called the philosophy of this truth. It has been already indicated that the scope of empirical philosophy is limited. A philosophy which has its origin in wonder and curiosity ceases to grow with the satisfaction of wonder. A philosophy having its origin in religion ceases to exist with the satisfaction of the religious dogma. A philosophy which has its origin in science loses itself in science. In none of these cases does it enjoy freedom. Instead of governing the whole of life it is itself governed by the creation of artificial compartments in a full life. How can such a philosophy deal with the truth of life or truth of existence? A philosophy that deals with this eternal truth about the spring of eternal life, is highly transcendent in its disposition.

The truth of life is God. It is what governs the whole of life, in all its phases, the life, past, present and future, life with its conditions, presuppositions and aims; the life of all creatures and all worlds. What may be called God in the modern language is called Īśvara in Indian thought. It must be not only all comprehensive but also much more than all that put together. No human mind is able to grasp it. All that is said about it or that can be said about it is drawn from empirical conditions so that the total output is nothing beyond the empirical. If in one philosophy it is asserted there is already another philosophy to negate it. Even in India if the philosophy of Nyāya holds that God must be accepted as the author of the world, Cārvāka readily points out that the world is self-sufficient and it needs no author. All these are empirical considerations. There is thus no finality in empirical conclusions. Even to observe it is nothing more than being empirical. This is how empirical conclusions are contradictions in terms.

The idea of truth, the idea of God, call it an intellectual necessity or a figment of the imagination, is what makes life a riddle. With all the comforts that man enjoys, his failure to overcome this riddle is painful to him. By reason of this pain he becomes a sceptic, an agnostic, a theist or a mystic. But to be all this is not to get rid of the idea of truth. In the attempt of going away from it, it becomes more confirmed. No determination and no philosophy against it is successful. Against them the riddle becomes more pronounced and the activities against truth negate themselves. The riddle is so persisting that no man is bound by his own conclusions. This is the cause of duality in life. If in any man consistency is found, it is forced on him. With great difficulty it is practised. Nobody knows when he will turn his back on it. To say that philosophy has its origin in wonder, religion or in science is only a particular mode of reacting to this riddle. Man is unhappy without solving this riddle. He tries to find out some solution. If he is a man of influence others sheepishly follow him. This accounts for the popularity of philosophies. But no reaction is able to remove the riddle. To satisfy a particular demand of mind does not bring solace to life. Others may follow some one else's philosophy, because they are thoughtless. But it is very difficult to say that the philosopher himself follows his own philosophy, because his mind is ever growing. If others adore him he sees more and more the insufficiency of his own thinking. This is how the riddle of life is never solved by empirical thinking. Empirical thinking is therefore no solution of this perennial problem. It finally makes the philosopher doubt everything including himself. It leads on to show that with or without philosophy the world is the same and the truth of life is never touched.

IV. RELIGION AND PHILOSOPHY

At this juncture, consciously or unconsciously seeing the uselessness of philosophy, man has recourse to faith. What he loses in intellect, he thinks, he gains in faith. Truth cannot be reasoned out and it cannot be understood. But man can have faith in it. He may have faith in all that the knowledge of that truth promises. This attitude of man is called religion. But has man gained what he lost in philosophy? The man of faith simply says 'yes', but the philosopher says 'no'. This seems to be an eternal conflict. Philosophy and faith do not go together. The attempt to bring the two together is neither philosophy nor faith. This is the defect of mediaeval philosophy in the west. It is also the defect of all those who uphold religion in the name of philosophy.

In this circumstance the language made use of by philosophy is borrowed by religion. For this reason both appear to be similar. They appear to be interchangeable. They are considered to be companions and complementary to each other. This companionship seems to be indispensable. But their distinction is ignored. One is mistaken for the other. An attempt to uphold either gives rise to conflict. Philosophy means effort; and religion no effort. Religion therefore becomes popular. It commands support. Consequently philosophy suffers. The result is that there is all religion and no philosophy. The history of civilisation of the whole of humanity is marked by these different stages of interaction and strife of religion and philosophy.

Religion in this sense is the worst possible enemy of philosophy. To introduce religion into philosophy is to negate philosophy. This is made evident by the history of every country. Politically wars are not fought so much for material possessions as for ideas and ideals. Protection of law and order, dharma-saṁsthāpana, is the keynote of every war. Viewed from this point of view history is nothing but the outcome of the interaction of religion with philosophy or in other words of the status that philosophy enjoys. It is obvious that every idea of possession is governed by an outlook and an ideal.

The difference between philosophy and religion as has been so far defined is this. While philosophy is possible religion is the failure of thought. Philosophy which deals with the truth of life and existence may not be readily conceived. But there is in thought everything that helps the formation of that philosophy. So philosophy does not presuppose the negation of thought. Making use of the available elements in thought philosophy proceeds on and as it proceeds it enriches the thought process.

But the case of religion is different. One has no right in believing in a thing which one is expected to understand. To believe in a thing is to arrest the progress of thought. Thus it negates thought. It is just the recognition of failure of thought. Understand a thing. There is scope for further understanding of the same. Believe in a thing. It breeds further beliefs. Further to understand a thing is to recognise the reality of the same. But belief has nothing to do with the reality of the thing believed. If understanding takes place there is no room for belief. But belief is taken to be a necessity when the thing does not come to the purview of understanding. All cases of belief are therefore of the character of super-imposition. Even the belief in great and exceptional things such as God does not command truth. To believe in something does not mean the existence of that thing. To attribute great and exceptional qualities to it does not mean that it is made substantial. To believe in it, to adore it, to worship it, and to depend upon it, may seem to give some comfort and solace. But it does not ensure the reality of the object. As he goes on depending upon it, man is soon assailed by doubts which he cannot quieten by means of belief. In this circumstance all his religion is gone. Disappointment is the result and it becomes an addition to the already existing misery. Thus while religion binds, philosophy liberates. Śruti says: 'Of those aspirants only he who has understood the Truth in the manner in which it is expounded by Śruti becomes immortal. To attain to immortality there is no other method.' (140)

Sometimes an Upanisadic word śraddhā is translated as faith. But the sense in which śraddhā is used in the Upanisads is different. In this sense it is distinguished from the faith we have so far considered. As distinguished from this faith, śraddhā means unalloyed devotion to knowledge or devotion to truth. It may express itself at the first stage, in rejecting all that is empirical, all that is meaningless and all that is unintelligible. At a higher stage it may express itself in making efforts to find out that philosophy which deals with the truth of life and existence. Having fully recognised this significance of śraddhā, devotion, it may even be translated as faith and faith in this condition may be termed religion. Further if such a philosophy is found to adopt effectively the truth it expounds and to practise it accordingly, it may then be termed religion. But it must not be forgotten that in both these cases faith, in other words, religion is intellectualised. It is now something to which the language of the Upanisadic śraddhā may be applied. It is in this circumstance no longer hostile to philosophy but is an aspect of understanding itself. As religion in this sense is rare, its imitation is very easy. Instead of religion becoming the output of profound thought, it becomes the result of intellectual indolence. The tendency to imitate must be checked only by systematic education. It may however be noted that religion in this healthy sense has a significant place in the growth of philosophy. It is then the practical aspect of philosophy. Without it philosophy is barren, but with it, it is fruitful.

V. IN WHAT ENVIRONMENT IS THE PHILOSOPHY OF THE TRANSCENDENT POSSIBLE?

Is the philosophy of the truth of life and existence possible? This is the main question we must seek to answer. In answering this question we may start with the definition of philosophy. Philosophy is the science of being as being. It is the knowledge of the causes and laws of all phenomena. Its equivalent in Indian thought is tattva-śāstra. It is the science of 'the truth' of life and existence in the circumstance in which life as life, and being as being, are fixed. To understand this truth is also to understand the cause and law of life and existence. To know the truth of life and existence is to see life and existence in their entirety with all their presuppositions. The empirical life is only an appearance. It is not the life of reality. That it is only an appearance is evidenced by the fact that in every individual, philosopher or no philosopher, there is a serious attempt to transcend what is immediately given. It is therefore something to be rejected and something to be dispensed with. Even in the happiest moments man is never at rest. He never wants to confine himself to what is given. At every stage he is anxious to see further and to see what lies outside the present. To give a simile, one enjoys delicious food. But soon it is swallowed. To enjoy it again, further quantities of food are required. Empirical conditions therefore give no rest to man. It is for this reason that empirical life is characterised as bondage, saṁsāra, and misery, duḥkha, by Indian thinkers. The critics of Indian thought call the Indian attitude pessimistic. But pessimism implies the temper that emphasises misery and ignores happiness. It does not apply to Indian thought. This thought only shows that the so called happiness is in reality nothing but misery as it is the outcome as well as the seed of misery. It shows how reality is something superimposed as nescience, māyā, and its origin is illusion, bhṛānti.

The real is therefore transcendent. It is the truth of life and existence. Can we understand it as it is? Can we see it in its entirety? Is the philosophy of this truth possible? We are out to discover answers to these questions. All these are the questions pertaining to the problem of knowledge. So they take us to the question of the source of that knowledge. If there is a real source, then this knowledge is possible and not otherwise.

At the empirical level the field of human knowledge is confined to the knowledge caused by the five sense organs and manas which is commonly translated as mind. On the basis of this knowledge inference is constructed and communication by means of knowledge is effected. The normal and abnormal activities of these sources of knowledge are distinguished and right and wrong cases of knowledge are determined. None of these sources is able to present the truth that lies beyond the normal. Some of the Indian thinkers hold that it is possible to manage the knowledge of the truth by means of the sources that are already stated. The Buddha speaks of the immediate apprehension of reality. The Jina upholds immediate apprehension revealing reality, pāramārthika-pratyakṣa. The Nyāya-vaiśeṣika instals immediate apprehension resulting from an extraordinary condition of the subject such as the practice of yoga, yaugika-pratyakṣa. Sāṅkhya and Yoga maintain that the apprehension of the truth is effected by the practice of yoga consisting of eight limbs, angas. Pūrva-mīmāṃsā asserts that what may be called the inference proceeding on the strength of analogy, sāmānyato-dṛṣṭānumāna, is able to give us a general knowledge of the things that are transcendent in character. Whatever truth may lie in these positions, they have only a certain value, but not the higher and public value. One is welcome to think that he actually sees God. But it is very cruel on one's part to expect that others should respect him for it even though they have no hope of seeing God; and it is more cruel on one's part to appear as the saviour of mankind and by creating an illusion of gifts to make men forget all about the Ultimate Truth and its omnipotence. To speak of the extraordinary conditions of the individual seer of God does not carry us far, because so long as others are not able to have the same condition, one's seeing God is of no avail to them. These positions are therefore highly subjective. Even inference by analogy, sāmānyato-dṛṣṭānumāna, is after all an attempt to reduce the transcendent to the level of the empirical as it considers the former on the analogy of the latter. It has therefore all the defects which beset subjectivism. Similarly to speak of a mystic experience is nothing more than stating a mystery which nobody understands. What we need is an objective source which is universal in application even as the eye, the source of the knowledge of colour, is. The eye is not of one capacity in one and of another capacity in another. It is equal in all. It is indispensable if the knowledge of a colour is desired. Even though one desires it, it does not produce the knowledge of odour. Can we point to a similar source of the knowledge of truth?

In arriving at an answer to this we shall re-examine the field of the source of knowledge. It is a wrong procedure to assume something as the source of a particular case of knowledge because we want to have this knowledge. To assume that someone, having himself obtained the knowledge of the divine, is able to teach us that knowledge also belongs to this procedure. The correct procedure is to recognise knowledge because there is the source of knowledge which cannot in any manner be dispensed with. We recognise the knowledge of colour because the eye cognises it. Similarly is there any source of the knowledge of the divine which makes the recognition of this knowledge inevitable?

Of the three sources of knowledge, perception, inference and verbal testimony, normally man follows the dictates of the first two. But with regard to verbal testimony he exercises a certain amount of high-handedness and unwillingness too. He has not accepted verbal testimony, to make use of the Sanskrit word, śabda, as a source of knowledge, out of his free will. He recognises śabda, because he is helpless against it. He may determine not to know a thing. But when a śabda relevant to the thing occurs to him in spite of himself, he has the knowledge of the thing. Such is the power of a source of knowledge, that is, pramāṇa on the mind of man. After all man does not direct the mind, but the mind directs him. What is called control of mind, mano-nigraha, or control of mental states, citta-vṛtti-nirodha and so on is not the negation of mind. But mind is always there directing man so that ultimately what may be called man's life is his mind itself. It is said 'Mind alone is what leads to bondage or release of men.'⁽¹⁴¹⁾ As leading to bondage mind itself may be taken to be bondage. This character of mind is overcome by the study of the sources of knowledge, pramāṇas. So the study of pramāṇa is nothing but the study of the direction of the mind. With this study, the unreal and unnatural directions superimposed on the mind owing to man's illegitimate contacts become removed and finally there shines the mind in its pristine purity and fullness. With regard to the divine agency which is highly transcendent, to think that someone is able to teach us, someone is capable of seeing it is too much to assume. It is laying on the mind a very great burden which it cannot bear. It is to negate one's own mind, the divine gift, and to posit in its place an imaginary mind. It is practising unreality, anyāta, which is consistently denounced by genuine Indian thought from the very beginning. The greatness of Dattātreya, the avadhūta, consists essentially in boldly facing this false situation and asserting the greatness of the mind and its pristine spontaneity against it. He repeatedly observes in proper contexts the havoc done by imaginary means supposed to give us knowledge. He says 'If the mind and speech are not capable of expounding anything, where is there the possibility of having instruction, with reference to it, from a preceptor?'⁽¹⁴²⁾

A student of this literature is required to see that this is a very sweeping remark, as sweeping as it could be but one must have the capacity to comprehend it.

So what are commonly known as instruction and so on are only different methods of taking away from one the operation of verbal testimony on the mind. By such methods one is not helped. One rather becomes blind to the truth. Allow the eye to have its function. What happens? The knowledge of colour happens. Similarly allow verbal testimony to have its function. What happens? It gives the knowledge of the thing for which it stands without any interruption.

VI. INDISPENSABILITY OF VERBAL TESTIMONY, ŚABDA IN THE PHILOSOPHY OF THE TRANSCENDENT

How shall we allow verbal testimony to speak for itself without making it subjective is a question that demands serious consideration. This method has negative and positive aspects. We have at the outset to distinguish between two cases of verbal testimony. One is the case of the verbal testimony which has an absolute or complete meaning and which in order to give that meaning is completely furnished in itself. It must have therefore nothing derived in it. We may call this case of verbal testimony absolute. The word Samskrta primarily applies to this case of verbal testimony. The modification in the meaning and the corresponding changes in the formation of the testimony give rise to the language which may be called derived. In this circumstance what we defined as Samskrta becomes the basic language, because the latter case of language has its origin in the modification in the meaning of this language. The derived languages are many. They are the work of human agency at some stage or the other. Different modifications governed by the subjective and objective conditions give rise to different languages. What we commonly call Samskrta as one among many languages is not above modification in the meaning as well as in the psychological conditions behind its formation. Hence it also comes under derived languages.

Any word that occurs in Veda serves as an illustration of this point. Take for example the word Īśvara. It is a Vedic word occurring in such passages as Īśvaraḥ sarva-bhūtānām. The same word is used very commonly and it is taken to mean a master having something under him and something opposed to him. Even that which is under him is not under his complete control. So he is a master in a very limited sense. The limitation superimposed on the meaning of the word is the work of human agency. But the Vedic word īśvara means master in its complete sense. To this master there is evidently nothing opposed, and that which is under him is completely dependent on him having the very existence derived from him. Further, unlike the human master he is master at all times and in all circumstances. So the meaning of the Vedic Īśvara is complete; and the meaning of this word in the common usage is as incomplete as it could be. Hence the circumstance and the psychological background of the Vedic usage are totally different from those of the common use. The Vedic word being apauruṣeya, impersonal, is basic and the word of the common usage being pauruṣeya, coming from an agent, is derived. Convention is the origin of the derived languages, and convention is governed by human convenience. A thorough study of the languages spoken by human beings belonging to all places and to all periods of time is bound to reveal that after all, however well defined, they are derived; and a systematic study of this subject is bound to take us on to a language which we call Samśkr̥ta, in the sense that it is the basic language. Man may exist in any part of the world. But from the point of view of language he is still though unconsciously in communion with man at large. Language is not individual. It is social in its implication. As an experiment we may leave a child to itself, cutting it off from the rest of society. Either it becomes dumb or it develops certain sounds to signify things which it experiences, if there is an occasion for it to do this. But the very occasion brings to it a social connection which never remains passive without introducing its own language to the individual that is so far cut off from the rest of the world. If in this circumstance there occurs an inter-relation between the society and the child, society does not learn from the child, but the child corrects itself according to the needs of society. All this indicates that language is communal and universal in character. It is essentially human, covering the whole world without exception. If men are not brought together in any other respect, in language they are brought together. This brings to light the identity of the purpose of human life to commune and talk to one another through language. This is why philosophy is the property of all without exception. Unlike other sciences, it pertains to the very self of man per se. It is for this reason called, in Sanskrit, adhyātma.

To arrive at the language which is really basic is by no means easy. It presupposes a clear understanding of the nature and function of verbal testimony, the distinction between inarticulate and articulate sounds, the question of the relation between the word and its meaning, the question of organisation of sounds into words and sentences and so on. A brief study of these various ideas may be made. Whether it is articulate or inarticulate to convey its meaning, it forms per se the very disposition of the essence or character of sound. Nobody is an author of this disposition. You may take it to mean something which it does not naturally mean and something in which you are interested. You may even force the hearer to mean by the sound only that thing which you want to emphasise by means of dictionary or grammar. Even then the primary function of sound is first to give the idea of that thing which it naturally means. You may employ the sound produced by smiling to mean mourning. But to the hearer the natural meaning of the sound of smiling comes first to the mind. What applies to simple sounds also applies to words and sentences as well. You may employ the word 'good' to mean 'evil'. But to the hearer the natural meaning of the word 'good' comes first to mind. The relation between sound and its meaning is thus spontaneous. A technical meaning may be attributed to it. But even then the same sound is not deprived of its spontaneous meaning. If the word 'God' is taken by a devotee to mean only the instrument to realise his selfish ends, it does not mean that for a philosopher the word ceases to mean the protective principle of all. If the meaning of a word is spontaneous, then the formation of words and sentences out of simple, articulate sounds must also be spontaneous. If anybody is the author of this formation, then the words can never have spontaneous meaning, as the author of the formation becomes the author of the meaning also.

There is an idea prevalent among philosophers that the world of meaning means much more than the world of sounds. An analogy from common experience gives colour to this idea. Often all of us have the experience that the complex idea of our mind cannot be expressed by words. On the strength of this analogy it is considered that even though we attain to a language which is truly basic, we cannot hold that it has a spontaneous relation to its meaning, because this meaning is reality itself as it exists. To solve this difficulty it is assumed that language fails to comprehend reality. Reality is a matter of immediate experience and it is only suggested or pointed to by language, but it is never denoted or connoted by it. There is even the theory that bare language is not enough to touch reality, but the total effect of a word gives us the idea of reality. Against all these ideas, one essential point may be noted. Supposing all this is true and language by itself is unable to grasp reality and the knowledge is actually obtained, is the fact that knowledge is actually obtained clear to knowledge itself or not? If it is not, then it is no knowledge. If it is, then it must necessarily be capable of being expressed. In this case if the expression does not take place, then it is the defect of the environment, but it is never the defect of language itself. In case it is expressed in whichever manner, then the expression itself serves as language. It is in fact this aspect of language that can be truly called basic.

VII. THE IMPERSONAL, APAURUṢEYA CHARACTER OF SOUND OR VERBAL TESTIMONY, ŚABDA AND ITS IMPLICATIONS

Having attained to this language it is easy to see that it is not conditioned either in its formation or in its capacity to mean something by any external agency. It is self-moulded and self-formed. In this sense it is called impersonal, apauruṣeya. As it is impersonal, its validity is not conditioned by anything external. In the case of ordinary language, its validity depends on the person who happens to be its author. If the author is supposed to have understood what he wants to communicate and reports it correctly, or in other words, if the author is an āpta as he is called in Sanskrit, then his expression is supposed to be valid. In Indian philosophy the author of each system is taken to be a person of this type, āpta, and on the strength of this assumption the teaching of each is relied on. Whatever value may be attached to this mode of thinking we must not fail to see that what we rely on in such cases is one man's thought. Its merit may be anything, but so far as we who are in need of some sure knowledge are concerned, it has only a private value and there is nothing public or universal in it. If the author is really able we may miss his ability. If what he says is correct we may fail to understand the correct meaning of his statement. Even though what he says is wrong there may be the danger of attributing a correct meaning to it. Even though he is not serious, sincere and meaningful, because of the love for the man and the subject we may attribute to him all seriousness, sincerity and meaning. But the case of the impersonal, apauruṣeya is different. Its validity is self-established.

We have so far arrived at this conclusion. Truth is transcendent. Empirical sources of knowledge, pramāṇas, are not enough to reveal it. If there is a source, pramāṇa, to reveal it, then that source, pramāṇa ought to be impersonal, apauruṣeya. Which is this impersonal source of knowledge? It is in the first place not that of which the author is given. Even supposing the truth is revealed to any person, his exposition is not revealed to him. While the truth is revealed, the exposition is his. Any sacred literature of the world may be taken as an example. It is the work of an author. The author is the person to whom truth is said to have been revealed. In this search we come across one case of literature which is handed down to us as being authorless, aprasiddha-karṭṛka. It is what is called Veda consisting of four divisions, mantra, brāhmaṇa, āranyaka and upaniṣad. From the beginning it is considered to be impersonal, apauruṣeya, and there is no circumstance that tells us that it is composed by any author. From the beginning, in spite of the changes the world is undergoing, its purity is preserved and it has been handed down to us from mouth to mouth. By the best of thinkers such as Śankara, Rāmānuja and Madhva, it is respected as impersonal, apauruṣeya, its thought is expounded against all that is personal, pauruṣeya (coming from authors) and is established.

After introducing Veda as impersonal, apauruṣeya, the thinkers did not rest there. They applied all tests of validity to it until they were completely satisfied. Originality in thinking, novelty of the subject matter, non-sublatedness of the position taught, endless continuity of spiritual growth and the disposition of the knowledge to effect eternal peace and immortality in the possessor of this knowledge are some of the main tests of validity in this context.

Originality in thinking is the characteristic of the impersonal verbal testimony, apauruṣeya. If Veda were a revelation it could not be original. In every case of revelation the truth is revealed and it is given out by the person to whom it is revealed. In this circumstance his act of grasping the truth has originality. But his giving it out has already lost novelty because it is after all imitating what is once grasped. It is here that the defect caused by authorship becomes evident. All cases of revelation suffer from this defect. Veda being impersonal, apauruṣeya, is original in the sense that it presupposes no mind behind it. It is therefore no revelation.

What is presented by the impersonal Veda is novel in every aspect. It is such that it is presented by nothing else. There is therefore nothing by which to measure the impersonal Veda. As its subject matter is given by nothing else, by nothing else can it be substituted. To lose it is to lose everything worth possessing. It is for this reason that the subject matter of the impersonal Veda is characterised as understood only by means of Veda, vedaika-samadhigamya.

Non-sublatedness of the position expounded is another characteristic of the impersonal Veda. With reference to every position arrived at, it is necessary to see that it is not sublated by any other case of knowledge. This is an implication of the idea that the subject matter of the impersonal Veda is not apprehended by the other sources of knowledge. If they are incapable of apprehending it, then they are incapable of denying it. It is here that an exhaustive study of the relative merits of philosophies of all grades becomes a necessity so as to show how the non-vedic philosophies of all grades are incapable of teaching the Truth absolute. This accounts for the highly philosophic character of the study of the Vedas.

Effecting endless continuity of spiritual growth adhyātma-vidyādhigama is another characteristic of the impersonal Veda, apauruṣeya. Empirical knowledge does not indicate the growth of the self. It is in fact a burden which the innermost desire wants to shake off. It is entertained to gain an advantage. If there is the realisation of the advantage or if it is known that it cannot be realised owing to some condition, there is immediately an attempt to forget all about this knowledge. The knowledge obtained by the study of arts and sciences belongs to this class. With reference to it to say 'love for knowledge' or 'knowledge for the sake of knowledge', is more a fashion than the statement of a truth. But the knowledge obtained by the Vedic study marks the growth of the self. With the increase of study and knowledge, man achieves a finer outlook and deeper wisdom. Judging from this point of view there is very little to support non-Vedic philosophy, i.e., the philosophy that has its origin in empirical conditions of life. More often this philosophy comes as a justification for what has been already constructed in the mind of the philosopher. By whims and fancies man gets a certain idea and subsequently he finds some philosophical justification for what he has subjectively constructed. For this reason he himself has no faith in the philosophy attributed to him. If occasion demands it he changes his view and develops something else. Men may mistake it for originality and honesty. But it never helps the growth of the philosopher's outlook. Thus in the case of empirical philosophy, because philosophy here has nothing to do with real life, there is no hope of spiritual growth. But this is not the case with Vedic philosophy. To follow it is to assimilate it. It is to lead the life of it. It is to mould the life that follows in its direction. It is not to find, in philosophy, the justification for an activity of life. But rather it is to find the justification of philosophy in one's own activities of life. This is how Vedic philosophy ensures endless continuity of spiritual growth.

To give the philosopher eternal peace and immortality is another characteristic of Vedic philosophy. In every case of human misery the cause is wrong knowledge. Correct knowledge is always the mark of peace. Peace is in the Vedic language, ānanda. It is spiritual integrity. It is the realisation of the completeness and self-sufficiency of the self. With this realisation man does not depend upon anything external to him. This is a state of transcendence, turiya. No other state is marked by this realisation and the resultant peace. The other states, avasthās of man are empirical. They are waking, dream and dreamless sleep. In each of these states man is made to depend on things external to him. In the waking state he is drawn by his own senses to the external world. There appears to be gratification of the senses, indriyas. This seems to be caused by external objects. To gratify the senses is to exhaust himself. To own the gratification caused is to acknowledge his dependence on things external to him. To depend on them is to be disappointed soon. Nothing is stable in the external world. What is seen is not there the next moment. The sense that seems to cause gratification wears out the next moment. Within himself man wants a change. He flies from pleasure to pleasure and becomes restless. Soon he is exhausted. At this point the waking state is over. Sleep overcomes him. But dreams stand in the way. He realises that waking is a misery, and dream is a misery. He has recourse to sleep. Soon sleep becomes a case of misery. He becomes exhausted by the repetition of these states. He becomes old and death puts an end to him and no one knows what happens to him. All this is the play of empirical existence. Every item of this knowledge lands man in a fresh misery. The theories about after-life of man, that is, life after death may be constructed in terms of heaven and hell, svarga and naraka. Even this thought becomes a source of misery. In every case he is drawn away from the truth of himself. This is how empirical knowledge, empirical construction and empirical philosophy do not help us towards peace. They are the places of mortality. Misery and mortality are the marks of wrong knowledge. Empirical life is therefore the life of wrong knowledge. All that is personal, pauruṣeya, is constructed by man. It is the source of wrong knowledge. The source of right knowledge is therefore impersonal, apauruṣeya. It deals with the inner truth of man. While by means of the empirical sources of knowledge, man is drawn outwardly, by means of the impersonal Veda, he understands the truth underlying his individuality. He appreciates the pervasion of this truth seeing that it is the underlying principle of all individuality. He has thus realised the oneness of all beings. This oneness is specified by the Īśa Upaniṣad: 'All this which is called the world is permeated by the Lord. Be satisfied with what he gives you, that is, find your peace in renunciation. Do not desire for the appropriation of what belongs to others.'⁽¹⁴³⁾ This is the realisation of the alldoership of the Lord without misappropriating it in any sense. With this realisation he has all, because he lives in the very truth which is all. This is the attainment of spiritual integrity. This is the state which admits of no change, no old age and no death. It is a state of bliss, ānanda and immortality, amṛtatva.

VIII. VEDA AND THE PROBLEM OF ITS INTERPRETATION

We have so far outlined the broad features of Veda. To appreciate its distinction from non-Veda is a matter of deep study of a serious nature. Ordinarily Veda is taken as one among the many literary works of the world. Some distinguish between the earlier and the later stages of Vedic thought, the latter falsifying the former. Some partially or totally deny the truth of Veda. This has given rise to the orthodox āstika and heterodox nāstika schools of thought in Indian philosophy. The orthodox thinking is marked by the recognition of Veda and the heterodox by the rejection of it. Whatever the disposition of the several conclusions may be, one thing becomes certain that thinkers of all centuries have been profoundly attracted by Veda and they have reacted to this attraction according to their predispositions.

It may however be noted that the circumstance in which Veda becomes a necessity for the man who is really after truth brings all branches of Veda together so that none of them is less or more important. Either it stands as a whole or not at all. Even to see and appreciate this is a matter of study, reflection and assimilation, śravaṇa, manana and nīdīdhyāsana under the guidance of an expert preceptor, guru. The desire to do this must have an inner urge which the Kaṭha Upaniṣad calls vicikitsā. As has been indicated in the opening pages of this work, to see the truth of all this requires intuition, pratibhā. Without it no amount of education can help. In whatever way intuition, pratibhā works itself, merely to posit it is to become aware of the danger involved in upholding any empirical ideas; and there it becomes necessary to support at least indirectly the need for recognising Veda. To recognise Veda as Veda is to see that it is the indispensable expression of universal philosophy.

In the process of the attainment of Veda itself, the method of its interpretation is suggested. The student who is after the truth of life and existence arrives at the conception of Veda with great responsibility of thinking. Unlike those who regard Veda as merely a part of Indian literature he cannot consider Veda in a light manner. If the whole Veda is one in bringing out the knowledge of truth, then the teaching of the whole Veda must be present in every item of its teaching. A recognition of this demands an interpretation of Veda equal to it. This is by no means easy. The words that constitute Veda are generally used by various authors according to their own convenience and in the sense that is relevant to their convenience. These usages have come down to common parlance. So even before we know that there is such a thing as Veda we are already familiar with the words, at least most of them, made use of by Veda. This circumstance makes a correct approach to Veda very difficult. Even granting that the spirit of approach is correct, the common meaning given to the words unconsciously interferes with the interpretation of Veda.

In this circumstance when the common meaning is carried on to Veda, Veda itself becomes lost. So far as the knowledge of truth is considered we remain where we are in spite of our study of Veda; because by the Vedic word we do not understand anything new but only what we already know. Further with the common meaning attached to Veda, Veda becomes a collection of contradictory statements and to a discerning eye each statement becomes a contradiction in terms. One statement, 'From Ātman came ether'⁽¹⁴⁴⁾ is in conflict with another statement 'From which all these elements come . . . that is Brahman.'⁽¹⁴⁶⁾ Whether Ātman is Brahman or it is different from Brahman we do not know. The same affirmations cannot be made of the two. Further 'I am the Ātman and Brahman'⁽¹⁴⁶⁾ is another statement. When I know nothing about creation how can I accept that I am Ātman, the creator and Brahman, the source of all? Moreover, Brahman is given as all this by the statement 'All this is indeed Brahman'⁽¹⁴⁷⁾ Still less can I therefore identify myself with Brahman. Therefore arises the need for the determination of the meaning of Veda and this determination is called Vedānta.

IX. THE RISE OF VEDĀNTA

At this juncture, an entirely novel method of Vedic interpretation becomes a necessity and without it nothing is got out of Veda. Any attempt at removing the contradiction results in a greater contradiction. Some portions of Veda appear as dealing with action, karma. The other portion appears to deal with knowledge, jnāna. We have to reject one or the other if we are to accept either. The reason for this difficulty is that we do not know the whole Veda and its entire meaning. All our attempt at interpretation is very much limited in scope. Therefore our attempt, however serious and scholarly it may appear to be, does not apply to all the circumstances of Veda. Further, someone's satisfaction with regard to a meaning may not satisfy the meaning attached to it by the Vedic demand.

In answer to all these difficulties a student may, by chance (īśvarānugraha) come across a Vedic tradition (sampradāya) which alone can be of advantage to him. The student who is born and moulded in Indian life is naturally introduced to this tradition. The tradition is this—Veda is impersonal, apauruṣeya. It therefore emanates from the creative principle itself. This is stated by Veda as 'he who made Brahmā, the creator of all at the beginning of creation gives him all the Vedas.'⁽¹⁴⁸⁾ This is how Veda is handed down from mouth to mouth. Owing to a degeneration in the outlook of its later followers Veda ceased to function well. Moreover its profundity and vastness made it difficult to comprehend. The same creative principle appeared as the giver of the Veda, having divided it into suitable divisions so that it might be more readily understood. For this reason the giver of Veda becomes known as Vedavyāsa. Further, to help the interpretation of Veda the same Vedavyāsa showed the way by following which the one meaning of Veda can be found out. This is the work which is celebrated all over the world and called Brahma-Sūtras. Because it decides the meaning of Veda, it is called Vedānta.

Vedānta, that is, Brahma-Sūtras, consists of four chapters, adhyāyas. They are called in order, samanvayādhyāya, avirodhādhyāya, sādhanaādhyāya and phalādhyāya. In the first chapter the unity of the whole Veda is brought out so that the one meaning of the whole Veda with all its details can be easily understood. In the second, all oppositions including the opposition of philosophical systems of all types are removed. In the third is shown how the correct understanding of Vedānta is the one discipline that is truly spiritual in character. In the fourth it is shown how attainment of the whole knowledge is a spiritual joy and results in giving eternal joy, ānanda, which is immortality itself. The first five aphorisms introduce the subject matter so thoroughly that the student understands the very essence of the whole teaching beginning with 'Next therefore, enquiry into Brahman, the subject matter of Veda, ought to be conducted.'⁽¹⁴⁹⁾ With the first aphorism, enquiry into the Brahman starts. Enquiry in this connection means understanding, reflection and assimilation. What is Brahman? This is answered by the second aphorism 'Brahman is that from which birth etc. of all this (world) come.'⁽¹⁵⁰⁾ What is the source of knowledge of this Brahman? This question is answered by the third aphorism, 'Because śāstra, that is, Veda is the source of knowledge.'⁽¹⁵¹⁾ If it is possible to interpret śāstra, that is Veda in favour of something else, how can then śāstra, be the source of knowledge? This is answered by the fourth aphorism, 'Only Brahman is the meaning of the whole śāstra, because the Vedic words being understood in the light of the whole Veda give only that meaning.'⁽¹⁵²⁾ Can Brahman be understood? Can it be expounded? This question is answered by the fifth aphorism, 'It (Brahman) is the subject matter of śāstra and it is therefore not expounded by śabda, that is Veda.'⁽¹⁵³⁾ This means that Brahman is understood in so far as it is considered to be above understanding and exposition.

On the basis of these ideas the Brahma-Sūtras show that Veda and Veda alone is truly the one case of the science of Brahman, Brahma-Vidyā. Śruti and so on are other names of Veda. Vedavyāsa has composed several other works expounding and illustrating certain important details of this science of Brahman. These go by the names, Purāna, Itihāsa and so on. These are called Smṛtis.

They cannot be appreciated without a correct understanding of Vedānta.

The outlook of samanvaya, that is, interpreting the whole field of Śruti and Smṛti in terms of the whole Veda, in favour of Brahman is by no means a burden imposed on these works; nor is it a device invented by the later thinkers of the country to meet certain oppositions. This method of interpretation, samanvaya, is demanded by Veda itself and the Smṛtis are composed to illustrate how this method of interpretation governs the whole Vedic thought. This point may be briefly indicated: Māṇḍūkya-Upaniṣad says, 'Aum, Veda, that is, the truth taught by Veda, is the imperishable one. It is indeed all this. In its extension it is the past, present and future and all is only the truth taught by Veda. That which is beyond the threefold aspect of time also is nothing but the truth taught by Veda. All this is Brahman. This is itself, Ātman. That this self has four aspects . . . the fourth one has no syllable mātrā (to present it) and it is therefore inexpressible. It is the state in which the manifold world has disappeared. It is auspicious. It is identity. Thus this truth is self itself. Thus he attains self itself taught by Veda by self who understands the truth in this manner: who understands the truth in this manner.'

In this passage the whole reality is reduced to aum, that is, the truth taught by Veda. It is the imperishable principle of all. It is the origin of the whole Veda: and the whole Veda is in its turn reduced to aum, the mother of Veda. This explains how the said method of Vedic interpretation consisting in seeing in each Vedic word the teaching of the whole Veda is indispensable if anything can be understood out of the Veda. The same point may be further illustrated.

Chāndogya says: 'That which is the truth taught by Veda, aum is imperishable. It ought to be meditated on as being the highest truth. It is indeed sung as the highest principle of all. Its extension is (all this).'

Taittirīya says: 'The truth taught by Veda, aum is Brahman. It, aum is all this.'

Mundaka says: 'That this (self) moves within the heart of every being born in various ways. Meditate upon self as the truth taught by the Veda, aum. You have done the best. It is beyond darkness. It is the only means for transcending bondage.'

In the light of these ideas it is clear that the whole of Veda is an extension of aum and the truth taught by Veda, aum is Brahman.

The Upanisadic word aum is taken to mean the truth by Veda. This requires an explanation.

The word aum stands for a sound. Brahman is an entity, artha. Therefore the identity of the two requires justification. To overcome this difficulty in the course of the history of philosophy several solutions have been suggested. The Vedānta solution is that the Upanisadic expression, 'aum is Brahma' is equivalent to 'That which is signified as aum is Brahman.' The expression, aum iti means 'That which is signified as aum'. Aum constitutes the letters a, u and m. A is Brahman. Śruti says 'that which is signified as a is Brahman'. Brahman is the imperishable, aksara. It is the imperishable principle of all that exists. For this reason it is called u. U means ucca, the highest. As the origin of all, it is all. It is the nature of knowledge. It is therefore called m. The root man means that which measures. Knowledge measures all. Thus Brahman is satya, the source of the reality of all, and jñāna, the knowledge as the explanation of all. As satya and jñāna, Brahman is complete, pūrṇa, that is, ananta.

So to understand the meaning of the Veda is to see that Brahman, that is, aum is its one meaning. This means the reduction of the whole Veda into one single truth as its meaning. The outlook and equipment behind this is the method of interpretation called samanvaya.

Vedānta is thus not a system founded on the basis of Veda. It is one with Veda. To distinguish it from Veda is to deny it. It is the process of Vedic thinking. Vedic thinking is no other than Veda. To see the identity of the two is to have Veda. To have Veda is to have Vedānta. This is the truth divine posed in its true character. It marks the greatness of Indian thought. Śaṅkara, Rāmānuja, Madhva and a number of other great philosophers of the country are great because of their realisation of the oneness of Veda and Vedānta. As bringing out this great truth by way of commenting on Vedas, that is as bhāṣya-kāras they have done great service to humanity.

Lord Dattātreyā as the author of the Avadhūta-Gītā appears as a great defender of Vedānta. He says at the very commencement of this work—'What forms the quintessence of Vedānta, what is knowledge or specialised knowledge is 'I am self, Ātman, formless and all-pervading by my very nature'.'⁽¹⁶⁸⁾ The idea is this 'I' is the name of the self, Ātman. Ātman is formless because it is infinite. As it is formless and infinite it is all-pervading. That it is all-pervading in this specified sense means that it is the source of the reality of all.

This makes it clear that what he is expounding in the shape of the Avadhūta-Gītā is the quintessence of Vedānta, Vedānta-sāra-sarvasva. He repeatedly points out that Vedānta is no other than Veda by illustrating that what he teaches is identical with what the Śruti says. 'It is well established that all this is Brahman. Śruti expounds this truth in various manners.'⁽¹⁵⁹⁾ He says further 'All Śrutis are one in teaching (Brahman) as attributeless, pure and imperishable.'⁽¹⁶⁰⁾ With reference to the world 'The Śruti "neither this nor that" shows that the world of the five-fold element is unreal.'⁽¹⁶¹⁾ Throughout in his teaching he insists on the spirit of samanvaya which he presents as samarasa, the outlook of equipoise, the art of interpreting an expression of Śruti in terms of the whole Veda. He presents himself as samarasa-magna, one who has dived deep in the essence sama, the essence of samanvaya. This means that he is the expounder and upholder of Vedānta. He clearly points out that without samanvaya, Śruti is of no use, that is, it does not give knowledge. He says 'Without samarasa, the outlook of samanvaya, the hymn called Veda, that is, chandās, never helps (the student).'⁽¹⁶²⁾ He confirms the same idea in several other connections.

X. VEDA AND VEDĀNTA ARE THE GIFTS OF THE LORD ĪSVARA TO SUFFERING HUMANITY

Lord Dattātreyā in the very opening passage of Avadhūta-Gītā notes that the disposition of identity, advaita-vāsanā is the pre-supposition of the knowledge the source of which is so far defined. Without this disposition in spite of the source of this knowledge, knowledge does not occur. What the Lord notes comes with conviction, so what he says becomes established. This means that it has every reason to establish it. Having thus established that the disposition of identity is the origin of the whole process of the spiritual realisation consisting of knowledge and through it liberation, the Lord mentions that the one origin of the disposition of identity is the grace of the Lord. This grace is itself the gift of the Lord. Being the origin of the disposition, the Lord is the origin of the whole spiritual life of the aspirant.

How does the grace of the Lord come and with what pre-supposition? An answer to this question is absolutely necessary. Without a satisfactory answer to this question if one simply believes that one has every realisation through the grace of the Lord, there is the danger of one becoming irresponsible. With this belief there is the possibility of losing one's faith in moral life itself. Moral life in the ordinary sense is the result of the recognition of one's responsibility for one's action. Believing loosely that the Lord does things for one, one may develop within one's self irresponsibility and thereby immorality. Hence as the concept of grace is great, great is the effort required to understand the concept. The concepts, Īśvara, anugraha, advaita, vāsanā and so on belong to the science of Brahman. We must therefore find the answer to the question in this science itself.

'O agni' For our sake you come in contact with good Similarly for the sake of destroying our evil you become prepared. With regard to both these cases an example is given, namely, "just as for the sake of the son the father himself becomes prepared, in the same manner" ⁽¹⁶³⁾ The idea is this The father is good to his son out of his own will; the son need not make any special effort to prepare the father. Similarly the Lord, agni, in the present context is invoked to be good to the devotees of his own accord. This is how, in this light of this passage, the gift of the Lord takes place.

The same idea is further studied in the Kātha Upanisad. Having come to Yama, Naciketas prays for the knowledge of Brahman. To test the pupil Yama tries to distract him. Naciketas becomes more confirmed in his desire to know Brahman and insists upon obtaining knowledge. Yama is pleased with the pupil. He explains that to understand Brahman is very difficult because Brahman is 'something that cannot be discussed as it is very subtle.' ⁽¹⁶⁴⁾ He continues further 'O Dear! This knowledge (of Brahman) cannot be had by means of reasoning. That which is taught by another person, the preceptor, is capable of producing knowledge.' ⁽¹⁶⁵⁾ Further, in continuation, Yama says, 'This Ātman (Brahman) is not attained by study, nor by intellect, nor by much learning. Whom it chooses as its own, by him it is attained. To him it reveals its forms, that is, its essence.' ⁽¹⁶⁶⁾ Does Ātman choose any one it pleases? 'No' says Yama 'He who has not retired from evil actions, he who does not maintain peace, he who is distracted, he who has peaceless mind, does not attain to this truth by means of knowledge.' ⁽¹⁶⁷⁾ The idea is that he does not obtain knowledge because of his inherent inability, evil action and so on. This observation means that the gift of the Lord is not indiscriminate. He to whom it occurs is fitted to have it. Fittedness is the disposition of identity in the language of the Avadhūta

Gītā. It is therefore the Lord's Grace itself. Reflection upon this circumstance makes us understand how the grace of the Lord is the crowning principle of moral and spiritual discipline.

The Bhagavad-Gītā explains further how exactly the grace of the Lord takes place. The statements of this work are self-explanatory. Lord Kṛṣṇa says: 'Whenever there is the destruction of dharma (right knowledge in this context) O Bhārata! then in order to put an end to adharma (wrong knowledge) I create myself (as a teacher).'⁽¹⁶⁸⁾ 'I teach this, the most secret truth to you who are devoid of envy.'⁽¹⁶⁹⁾ 'I take care of those who are devoted to me without break.'⁽¹⁷⁰⁾

Arjuna says (Arjuna is the pupil whom Kṛṣṇa is teaching) 'In order to do me good this secret science pertaining to Ātman is taught to me by you. By this my illusions are removed.'⁽¹⁷¹⁾ In this passage Arjuna acknowledges that the instruction he is receiving is the gift of Kṛṣṇa. He continues:

'O Lord! If you think it is possible for me to see the Lord of Yoga, show me yourself the imperishable.'⁽¹⁷²⁾ This means that the Lord's gift is not indiscriminate.

The Lord says: 'By me who is pleased with you, O Arjuna, the highest form of me is revealed to you, the reason being nothing but my power.'⁽¹⁷³⁾ So it is not Arjuna that makes the revelation of the divine form a necessity, but it is purely the divine will, the grace of the Lord.

The Lord insists that the grace, anugraha, is the only means because it covers all: 'Not by means of Veda, sacrifice, study, nor by charities, nor even by action, nor by severe austerities, can this form be seen in the world of men except by you, O the bravest of Kurus.'⁽¹⁷⁴⁾ The expression that 'it cannot be seen except by you' does not mean that there is something great in Arjuna himself, but it necessarily means in this context that which is great in him is nothing but the grace of the Lord. This is made clear by: 'Further hear (understand and practise) the best instruction of mine revealing the best of all secrets. As you are beloved of me I tell you that which is good for you.'⁽¹⁷⁵⁾

Arjuna could never conceive what this is; nor could he demand it. So to teach what is good for him is purely divine grace, because he has been already endowed by the Lord with a divine disposition which alone is the light that guides.

'Do not feel dejected. You are born with the divine disposition, O Pāṇḍava!'⁽¹⁷⁶⁾ The Lord is the unconditioned creative principle of all. So it is not correct to think that he selected Arjuna because of this element in him. In fact with the Lord's grace Arjuna is at this moment actually born with this divine element.

The indication of the grace is implied by the Lord's statement: 'Therefore śāstra is the source of knowledge to you with regard to the discrimination between what is right and what is wrong. Having therefore understood what is ordained by śāstra, that is, Veda you become qualified to do the right.'⁽¹¹⁷⁷⁾

The Lord states the effect of this science: 'Having your mind fixed on me, you transcend through my grace all miseries that are impossible to transcend.'⁽¹¹⁷⁸⁾ To fix the mind on the Lord is only the result of the study of this science. Therefore having given this science to Arjuna the Lord asks him: 'Be one whose mind is fixed on me. Be devoted to me. Be one who observes sacrifices because of me. Offer your salutations to me. You come to me, indeed. I assure you, you are beloved of me.'⁽¹¹⁷⁹⁾ So all that religion appears to give or promises to give has come to the philosopher. Such is the grace of the Lord. That is what science means.

The Avadhūta-Gītā echoes the same in a more explicit manner . . . 'To a person who has received this discourse from a preceptor and who has practised the truth taught, reality which is indeed no other than equipoise, reveals itself.'⁽¹¹⁸⁰⁾ This discourse is the science in the sense defined in the course of the foregoing exposition. To practise it is to understand and realise the truth it contains. It is the gift of the preceptor. The subject of realisation is the truth of equipoise, sama. It reveals itself but not on account of the discipline that one undergoes. The discipline is rather the forerunner of the divine grace. One who does not understand this truth does not have knowledge in spite of Veda. The Lord says:

'With regard to which there is indeed no knowledge, with regard to the same there is indeed no Veda.'⁽¹¹⁸¹⁾ So it is insight, pratibhā, that helps one to attain to Veda and through it, knowledge of the truth. If a person is devoid of insight, with regard to him Veda has lost its significance, and with this loss even the possibility of knowledge is denied.

The preceptor who does this favour to his pupil is nothing short of avadhūta, the philosopher. The Lord says: 'The Philosopher is compassionate . . . and the benefactor of the whole world '⁽¹¹⁸²⁾

So the Lord concludes: 'By the gift of knowledge from a preceptor, whether one is called a fool or a learned man, if only he understands reality, then he is liberated from the ocean of bondage.'⁽¹¹⁸³⁾

The gift of knowledge is what is called the grace of the Lord at the opening passage of the Avadhūta-Gītā. The disposition on the part of the student that is the forerunner of knowledge is the disposition of identity. With this, one is a man, and a man of discrimination. It is he that transcends all fear, i.e., bondage.

This knowledge, that is, the science giving rise to this knowledge is expounded in the following section.

2. DATTĀDVAITA: EPISTEMOLOGY, ONTOLOGY AND THE THEORY OF LIBERATION

The Avadhūta-Gītā is philosophical in its disposition.

Through the employment of a simple and melodious style, Śrī Dattātreyā in his Avadhūta-Gītā develops a system of thought which has an individuality all its own. In its truth-value it is no less than any Vedānta system usually known to us. In fact there are throughout this work glimpses which tell us that the exposition enumerates those fundamental principles of thought on which the Vedānta outlook itself is based.

The exposition of the Avadhūta-Gītā appears to be deductive in its apparent setting. But a closer study of the expressions reveals the fact that it is no less inductive. Take any expression, for example:—‘To whom shall I offer salutation? I am identity. I am defectless.’⁽¹⁸⁴⁾ Defectless identity is the identity that admits of no duality. When this is the truth, how can there be an object of salutation? To have that object is to uphold duality and negate identity. How is identity established? The proof is given in the former half of the verse. ‘The world consists of the interaction of the five elements—earth, water, fire, air and ether; and it resembles the water superimposed on the rays of the sun.’⁽¹⁸⁵⁾ The world is therefore inert, because it is non-spiritual. The spiritual is identity which admits of no duality. The non-spiritual is therefore sublated by the spiritual principle of all. In the previous verse, the statement ‘That by which all this is pervaded’⁽¹⁸⁶⁾ signifies that the world has no individuality of its own. It is not a second to the truth. It is only the creation of the truth characterised as self, Ātman, in recognition of its spiritual character and of the fact that the world is made by Self to exhibit its omnipotence which is no other than the overflow of its auspicious nature, the blissful character. Omnipotence is auspicious and the auspicious is bliss, in its completeness. Overflowing with complete bliss is therefore an indispensable aspect of omnipotence. These ideas illustrate how the whole composition of the present work is full of implied philosophy and how it is through and through inductive in its method of approach to reality. The details of all the problems that are to be discussed may not be expected in it. But there is enough indication that a detailed discussion of those problems is a necessary presupposition of the whole discourse. As an exposition of the Vedic and the Upaniṣadic truth the work has maintained the Vedic and Upaniṣadic style. This truth is not conveyed to a novice but to an adept who is well prepared to receive the instruction in all its completeness as best as he can possibly comprehend. So what is called Vedic or Upaniṣadic style is not a fashion; and it is inevitable and indispensable in an exposition to follow in which, insight, pratibhā more than learning is required. Each word, each context and each circumstance in which a concept is used in the present work brings to our mind the fact that the author is aware of the whole implication and responsibility of what he teaches.

In the light of the discipline given by all the foregoing ideas a philosophical study of the Avadhūta-Gītā may be briefly indicated. The soundness of a philosophical system depends upon the importance given to the theory of knowledge. Epistemology must lead on to ontology. If the position is reversed, then philosophy becomes fallacious as in this case the theory of being becomes only an assertion and the theory of knowledge is based on a false idea. Every philosophy that bases itself on subjectivism is liable to be wrongly founded.

If one looks at the Lord's statements, the fact that his treatment is in its entirety objective is revealed. He analyses with great care and insight the whole field of knowledge. He handles all problems connected with the truth of knowledge so clearly, definitely and effectively that his exposition goes home to the mind of the student and finally he has no alternative but to practise the life of the truth he has learned from the Lord's teaching. The Lord arrives at his philosophical conclusions with exceptional ability. His conclusions as a rule give no room for doubt. They are invariably the ontological implications of his theory of knowledge. His teaching is thus not barren. It is not mere speculation. It is practical in its very setting. To understand and appreciate it is to embrace a new life which is otherwise impossible. The scope of this new life or new outlook is freedom resulting in uniqueness, oneness or identity.

So the Avadhūta-Gītā may be studied with profit under three heads—Epistemology, Ontology and the Theory of Liberation.

1. Epistemology: The Theory of Knowledge

The author distinguishes between two types of knowledge: (i) knowledge in its essence which he calls svabhāva-bhāva and (ii) knowledge caused by philosophy. He calls this knowledge śāstra-saṁvitti.

(i) Knowledge in its essence: svabhāva-bhāva

Svabhāva-bhāva means self in its essence. This is a case of knowledge. This is presented as the basis of the instruction as: 'What is stated here is based on svabhāva-bhāva.'⁽¹⁸⁷⁾ It is possible to understand by this expression 'natural existence'. But in this sense it cannot be the basis of instruction. What is demanded in this context is the source of knowledge that is the source of instruction. There is no point in saying that natural existence is the source of instruction. But the knowledge of the natural existence can be the source of instruction. So svabhāva-bhāva is a case of knowledge. In support of this meaning the following may be noted. In this connection what exactly the author means by svabhāva-bhāva also becomes clear.

'Knowledge is not loose thinking, nor is it yoga in the sense of meditation, mental arrest; nor is it conditioned by space and time; nor is it the instruction given by an upholder of a dogma. It is svabhāva-saṁvitti. It is what is called "I". It is reality. It is space-like. It is spontaneity. It is all-enduring.'⁽¹⁸⁸⁾ All these attributes qualify the knowledge called svabhāva-saṁvitti. The statement that it is not reasoning and so on not only defines it, but points out that it presupposes the negation of all those cases—loose thinking, mental arrest and so on. As it is clear from the foregoing considerations, to negate loose thinking and mental arrest and so on is to posit philosophy in their place. So the implication of the whole negation as the presupposition of svabhāva-saṁvitti is that the knowledge caused by philosophy, that is, śāstra-saṁvitti is the presupposition of svabhāva-saṁvitti. The same idea is concluded: 'The truth is expounded on the basis of knowledge in its essence shaped by the knowledge of philosophy.'⁽¹⁸⁹⁾

The fact that 'knowledge in its essence', svabhāva-bhāva is a case of knowledge is further supported by the expression 'instruction of knowledge forming the essence of self', ātmasaṁvitti-upadeśa

concluding each chapter. Every chapter is therefore an instruction of the knowledge that forms the essence of the self, ātma-samvitti. This knowledge is further defined as: 'It is not that which meditates. Nor is it that which is meditated. It is not a case of instruction; nor is it of the nature of demanding action from me. It is knowledge. That is its nature. How can I define it? It is the very essence of freedom. It is defectless. It is "I".' (190)

It is further added: 'For the sake of this spirit, which is all and partless for the sake of this spirit which is all and absolutely all enduring, for the sake of this spirit which is beyond the reach of the creatures having two legs and such other beings, why do you bother within your mind? Equipoise is all that exists.' (191)

The same concept of this knowledge is further developed: 'Verily, it is the mind that is all-permeating without obstruction. It indeed transcends all concepts—extended, non-extended and neither. Verily it is mind that is all auspicious without exception. How can it be apprehended by manas (in the ordinary sense of a sense organ, an indriya?) How can it be expounded by speech?' (192) In this passage the Sanskrit word manas is used in two senses, (i) the knowledge that forms the essence of self and (ii) a sense organ inside the body helping the generation of the knowledge of external objects. Svabhāva-bhāva is thus distinguished from manas as a sense organ. In the same context its all-pervading character is brought out so as to show that it is all auspicious.

'For the reason that which is expounded and that which is not expounded are not real; for the reason that which is known and that which is not known are unreal indeed; if the Truth is one, partless and all-auspicious, how then can there be objects, organs, intellects and minds?' (193)

The knowledge that forms the essence of the self is therefore self itself and it is knowledge in essence. The author distinguishes it further from all that is relative and it is shown to be the highest truth.

'In the circumstances, secular in character, how can one understand reality? With reference to it how can there be the discussion about the ideas of form and no form? The highest truth is of the form of space. With reference to it where is the possibility of making it an object?' (194)

This passage explains how it is the very essence of the subject, the knowing principle and thereby illustrates how it is pure identity giving no room for duality in any sense.

So, knowledge in essence is what is called svabhāva-bhāva, ātma-saṁvitti. The sanskrit word saṁvitti means knowledge. Ātma-saṁvitti means that self, Ātman, is the same as Samvitti. Hence, self is knowledge. The same is the meaning of svabhāva-bhāva. Svabhāva means self as essence. Bhāva indicates its absolute character. This word further indicates that it is a case of spontaneity. In order to show that this knowledge is absolute knowledge, it is defined as manas, saṁvit and so on and it is in the same context distinguished from all that is relative.

Śrī Dattātreyā shows throughout how knowledge in essence is self-established and all else is of a derived nature. For him truth and reality are one and the same. All along the discourse he expounds the Upaniṣadic truth, 'Brahman is truth, knowledge and infinite'. It is the one subject matter of his exposition. Brahman as truth signifies that it is the source of all reality. Brahman as knowledge signifies that the truth is essentially spiritual. In bringing together truth and knowledge the Upaniṣadic position brings about the absolute character of the reality which it shows to be completely unlimited. Defined thus is Brahman. This is the reason why the author presents this knowledge in a negative fashion as 'the highest truth which is marked by the absence of knowledge and non-knowledge.'⁽¹⁰⁵⁾

That which is commonly called knowledge is essentially relative. It is relative to non-knowledge. It has a beginning and an end. It is therefore preceded and followed by non-knowledge. In itself it is limited by the subjective and objective conditions. Therefore it falls short of 'knowledge in essence' which is Brahman itself. While knowledge in the ordinary sense is opposed to and therefore relative to non-knowledge, 'knowledge in essence' is the basis of both knowledge and non-knowledge. The relative knowledge as well as non-knowledge forms the stuff or matter or content of what is called the universe. 'Knowledge in essence' is the truth underlying the universe. It is the basis as well as the origin of the universe. This is the reason why it is signified as the highest reality transcending both knowledge and non-knowledge. The realisation of this truth is 'knowledge in essence' itself. That is the highest accomplishment. That is liberation.

'Knowledge in essence' is the same as spirit, caitanya. It is all-comprising as well as all transcending. The whole world is essentially 'knowledge in essence' itself. It is therefore the state of equipoise, samarasa. In illustrating this point, the author calls it 'knowledge immortal, jñānāmṛta'. This is the self underlying all.

(ii) Knowledge in the normal sense and knowledge as philosophy, śāstra-saṁvitti.

(A) Knowledge other than the knowledge in essence, ātma-saṁvitti

Other cases of knowledge are also recognised by the author and they are the different items of what is commonly called knowledge. He points out by way of implication in different connections that great care must be taken not to confuse any aspect of this knowledge with 'knowledge in essence'. This type of knowledge or any aspect of it however great and exceptional it may appear to be is just that which knowledge in essence is not

The evaluation of the ideas connected with the several items of this knowledge shows that the author has a definite analysis of this knowledge in his mind in chalking out the programme of the work. He distinguishes between two kinds of this knowledge with a view to showing finally that after all these two kinds are the same in the scheme of Reality and in their essence. These kinds may respectively be called, correct and incorrect.

The distinction of these two cases of knowledge, correct and incorrect, is purely relative in importance. Each is of the same content and therefore what applies to one in the general sense applies to the other. Each has a reference to its object. But their distinction consists in this. Correct knowledge presents something actual, but what is presented by incorrect knowledge is not existent. To employ the technique of expression of the Darśanas this explanation of wrong knowledge is a variety of anyathā-khyāti. Accordingly wrong knowledge is that knowledge which presents an object that is not given. On the whole the work maintains, in so far as the empirical reality is concerned, a realistic view of knowledge, because it holds that each case of knowledge is relative to its object. But ultimately it upholds idealism as it points out that there is only one reality which it calls 'knowledge in essence'.

In arriving at this conclusion this is the method followed. Wrong knowledge is illustrated by the example of a mirage. This instance shows that wrongness consists in presenting that which is not existent as existent. Right knowledge is compared to wrong knowledge in point of the final unreality of its object. It is repeatedly shown to be similar to a mirage. Both are thus dispensed with. Their relative character is taken as the basis of showing their non-absolute nature. It is to point out that the real is the absolute and the non-absolute is not real. The absolute is thereby conceived as the meaning of the several texts of Śruti, 'That thou art' and so on. This is 'knowledge in essence' ātma-saṁvitti.

At the same time the author takes up the question of the relation or reference of 'knowledge in essence' to the normal case of knowledge. The problem is this. If all that is, is 'knowledge in essence', how then is there normal knowledge? How is there this unreal thing against the one reality, 'knowledge in essence?' In answer to this question, the state of equipoise of all is emphasised in the teaching and the corresponding outlook is expected from the student.

From this it follows that with reference to normal knowledge two aspects may be distinguished. Either this knowledge may be taken to be consistent with 'knowledge in essence' or inconsistent with it. If it is inconsistent then even though it is practically sound, it is sublated, that is, negated by 'knowledge in essence'. For it is relative and is therefore not self-establishing. It is inconsistent with 'knowledge in essence' and 'knowledge in essence' is complete and secondless. It is therefore impossible against the latter. To one who has realised 'knowledge in essence', it is no longer there. If on the other hand what is called normal knowledge is consistent with 'knowledge in essence' then it no longer maintains its individuality against the latter. Being consistent with it, it is reduced to the latter so that there finally shines only one truth, 'knowledge in essence'. Further, to be consistent with 'knowledge in essence' is to show not only the absolute character of 'knowledge in essence', but also to present itself as something completely derived, having nothing of its own. This is to show itself and all else connected with it and even the inconsistent and wrong knowledge related to it to be the work of 'knowledge in essence' each item of its work illustrating its wonderful capacities. Thus there is shown one operating power. It is identical in all. There is nothing outside it. It is the state of equipoise in all. It is immortal. It is all identity. There is no individual against it. It is all pervading like space. That is 'knowledge in essence'.

(B) Right Knowledge

Right knowledge is that knowledge which presents an object that is actually given as it is. The definition of right knowledge in this form is the necessary implication of the contrast of right knowledge with wrong knowledge and then showing its similarity to the latter. The author takes up the illusion of a mirage for an instance. By this very illustration he has distinguished the illusion from right knowledge. Further with great skill he points out that after all the so called right knowledge is nothing but an illusion even as the illusion of mirage.

Even as wrong knowledge, right knowledge in the presence of the operation of the causal conditions comes into being and after its function is over it goes out of it. The proximate causes of right knowledge are what is ordinarily called mind, manas and sense organs, reasoning and verbal testimony.

Perception: perception is the knowledge caused by the sense organs in co-operation with the mind, manas or mind independently of the sense organs. The sense organs in co-operation with mind cause the knowledge of external objects. Mind by itself causes the knowledge of pleasure, pain and so on. Of the five sense organs that exist on the outward surface of the human body, eyes, ears and nose, the organ that apprehends taste and the organ of touch, only eyes and ears are mentioned in the work. The trend of the exposition however implies that other organs also are recognised by the author. Mind, manas, is the abode of all mental activities—perception and non-perception. Perception is immediate and non-perception is mediate.

Perception has two stages, undetermined and determined.⁽¹⁹⁶⁾ A sense organ presents its object in an undetermined form and mind contributes determination. Mind has therefore the power to posit things which are imaginary and not real.

The discipline of yoga is recognised as capable of giving rise to knowledge. This may be treated as a variety of perception corresponding to yogi-pratyakṣa of other systems. Yoga is said to have six limbs, breath-control, posture, giving inward direction to the external senses, meditation with interval, continuous meditation, and absorption. In this discourse a subtle distinction is made between perception and immediate apprehension. The latter is called aparokṣa ⁽¹⁹⁷⁾ Though the latter is generally identified with the former it is more often in other systems of thought used in connection with the apprehension of the highest truth.

The psychological approach too is found in the Avadhūta-Gītā. The account of perception is closely based on psychology. The knowing agent is considered to have a body with five motor organs of speech, hand, foot, the organ of excretion and the organ of generation, and the five sensory organs. Inside the body there is a sense organ called manas and this word is translated as mind in the foregoing pages. With this the other sensory organs are in contact in order to give rise to the knowledge of their objects. Independently of them mind is the origin of feelings of pleasure and pain, imagination and other mental constructions. The knower, doer and enjoyer is called jīva, an individual self. By the control of these several organs an individual self is considered to have special powers. Through the practice of it the individual is supposed to have gained yogic powers, the culminating point of which is absorption, samādhi. All these operations however characterise the waking state. Empirical life consists of two other states, dream and dreamless sleep. In dream there are no activities of the external organs and sleep is marked by the absence of even the mental activities. But throughout these states, knowledge in essence operates. It is this shining principle which by its own merits gives rise to all the states and their several functions. The realisation of this principle is called the transcendent state. It is the state of beatific bliss, kaivalya.

Inference: Inference is the knowledge caused by reason. One has by reason of the knowledge of smoke, the knowledge of fire. On the part of the person who obtains this knowledge, the obtainment of this knowledge presupposes the knowledge that smoke implies fire and without fire there is no smoke. Inference is of the character of enquiry, vicāra. In this work several items of enquiry are mentioned as the enquiry into dimensions, short and long, the enquiry into difference and identity, bhinna-vibhinna-vicāra, the enquiry into the relationship of the external and internal, bahir-antara sandhi vicāra, the enquiry into the distinction between the moving and non-moving entities, carācara-bheda vicāra, and so on.⁽¹⁹⁸⁾ These enquiries indicate that a regular enquiry into all the problems of philosophy is indispensable. Nothing is too sacred for enquiry. Inference is called tarka. Its opposite is called vitarka. Inference gives rise to correct knowledge. Vitarka is defective reasoning. It does not give rise to right knowledge. In this connection the distinction between the correct and incorrect inferences also is presupposed.

Verbal Testimony: Like a sense organ and inference, verbal testimony also gives rise to knowledge. Under verbal testimony three aspects are distinguished. (1) Understanding something from what others have said. The highest aspect of this understanding is stated 'The men of wisdom say that reality is one only'.⁽¹⁹⁹⁾ 'The yogins understand all this,'⁽²⁰⁰⁾ and so on. (2) 'Instruction given by a teacher. This instruction is called gurūpadeśa.'⁽²⁰¹⁾ (3) The teaching of Śruti. This is illustrated by such passages as 'Thus by means of Śrutis "That thou art" and so on is established the truth with reference to self. That you are. You are all equipoise, being above all conditions.'⁽²⁰²⁾

(iii) The Relative Value of these three Sources of Knowledge

With regard to the relative value of these three sources of knowledge the following may be noted. Perception is limited to the given in space and time only. Inference is based on perception. If it were to give the knowledge of things that are beyond what is given, it becomes either false or subject to doubt. A thing that is beyond what is given, if at all it is apprehended, is apprehended only by means of verbal testimony. As we have already noted, three cases of verbal testimony are distinguished. Of them the information given by others may be complete in itself. But unless the person to whom the information is given is prepared to follow what is said it is not fully useful. Instruction from a preceptor becomes therefore inevitable. Even with regard to this certain details are to be noted. There are preceptors and preceptors. In most cases the instructions given by them may not touch the core of truth. The preceptor in question may not have attained that eminence which is required for imparting the truth. Especially with regard to the highest truth, if it is understood that there is nothing empirical in it, there should naturally be nothing empirical in the instruction given. Throughout the present work, instruction with an empirical import is shown to be of no avail to one who has the thirst for knowledge of the highest truth which is beyond all that is empirical. The author asks 'How can there indeed be any instruction of a preceptor?' Passages like this tell us that the instructions of empirical import are irrelevant to truth.

If the full implication of all this is properly appreciated then the conception of a real preceptor, guru, is not difficult to grasp. The author distinguishes the teacher of the truth as one who makes the pupil absorbed in the teaching and to this pupil he says, reality, that is, equipoise shines indeed.⁽²⁰³⁾ Verily this preceptor is Dattātreyā himself. He is the preceptor of preceptors

How this preceptor is possible is the real problem. The answer is found in the concept of Śruti. The real preceptor is he who does not pose himself as the knower of the truth and its teacher. He is really only the shadow of Śruti. His thought is moulded by Śruti. For him to teach the truth is to expound the teaching of Śruti. To expound the teaching of Śruti is not to take something from Śruti and discuss it with great elaboration independently of Śruti. This is to confuse the non-empirical with the empirical. The principal idea may be taken from Śruti but the elaboration at some stage or other becomes mixed with empirical ideas. To get rid of this difficulty one must give up the habit of explaining things having kept Śruti out of sight. But the one who ever keeps Śruti in view is as a rule expounding Śruti itself.

Lord Dattātreyā at every stage of the development of thought makes it clear that what he says is nothing but what Śruti teaches. He says, 'Śruti teaches adopting various methods, that all this is Brahman.'⁽²⁰⁴⁾ He ever sees unity of teaching in Śruti. He says, 'All that forms the quintessence of the final teaching of Veda, knowledge and specialised knowledge is this. I am self, formless, all-pervading by nature.'⁽²⁰⁵⁾ He indicates the subject matter of his exposition as: 'By the statement such as "That thou art" the real self is expounded.'⁽²⁰⁶⁾ 'The Śruti "neither this nor that" illustrates that that which is made of the five-fold element is unreal'⁽²⁰⁷⁾, and so on. He recognises how it is very difficult to arrive at unity of thought in Śruti. In illustrating this idea he says, 'Śrutis expound the truth in various manners'⁽²⁰⁸⁾ and 'Śrutis in various ways.'⁽²⁰⁹⁾ He comes to the conclusion that without Veda truth is lost. He says 'That which is defined as anmī'⁽²¹⁰⁾, that is, as only that which is expounded by Veda. These passages indicate how the present work is nothing but the exposition of Śruti.

The question naturally arises, how then are we to understand the import of Śruti? This is the real problem. The demand for solution is made more imperative by the way in which the highest truth is delineated throughout this work. The third chapter underlines with a special emphasis the negative way of presenting Brahman following the tradition of Śruti as expressed in 'not this, not this' neti neti of the Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka-Upaniṣad. The negative way of presenting Brahman is concluded in the third chapter as 'It is neither of the nature of void nor of the nature of non-void. It is neither of the nature of purity nor of the nature of impurity. Form or no form does not find a place in it. Nothing but equipoise is the reality, absolute' ⁽²¹¹⁾

Ponder on this deeply. It makes one highly reflective. For one who does not readily appreciate the highly secret nature of truth, Veda is after all a statement like all other statements. In this circumstance one is likely to give it just that meaning which one would give to any other statement. But the composition and evaluation of this meaning can never hope to transcend the empirical level, however exceptional the value given to it may be. Under this condition a person may think that what he knows is really Vedic. But in fact it is not. It does not stop merely with this negative idea. To believe in a wrong meaning of Veda is to lose Veda itself, because in the presence of this belief there is no possibility of correction. At this juncture Lord Dattātreyā warns the student and points out that truth is beyond Veda. He says, 'There is no Veda . . . no preceptor' ⁽²¹²⁾ and so on. The expression, 'No Veda' does not dismiss Veda just as the expression 'no preceptor' does not dismiss preceptor. Just as a false preceptor is dismissed by 'no preceptor', so also Veda with false meaning, that is, the false meaning of Veda is dismissed. The author makes this warning really significant when he concludes a number of chapters with the expression, 'There is indeed no necessity for Veda with reference to truth.' ⁽²¹³⁾ The reason he gives for this in the same context is that 'one never knows anything of the truth'. It is necessary to understand the implication of this reason. This reason after all characterises the truth. So it is a case of knowledge. What is the source of this knowledge? If it is anything other than Śruti, then the position becomes empirical. To hold that the mind of Dattātreyā is such that it breathes truth is after all a position beset with all difficulties to which an empirical position gives rise. The name Dattātreyā does not help the situation as the name may be made use of for all sorts of purposes. So to bring in the conclusion of Dattātreyā as a solution begs the question, as it is the assumption of the very truth that is expounded.

The key towards the solution of this difficulty is given by the author himself.

'The character of avadhūta must be understood by means of these letters by those who are the most holy, who know the truth contained in the meaning of the Vedic letters and who expound Veda and Vedānta.' ⁽²¹⁴⁾ What is the meaning of these two words, Veda and Vedānta and what is the relation of the two? By Vedānta is at times understood Upaniṣads. Can we accept this meaning in the present connection? No. By Veda or Śruti the author cites the passages, 'That thou art' and so on. This means that by the words Śruti or Veda he understands Upaniṣads also. Hence Vedānta must mean something else. What is this something? The clue towards the solution is given by the expression, 'by those that understand the real heart of the meaning of the letters that constitute Veda'. This gives us an idea how all those meanings that claim to be Vedic are not really Vedic. The true Vedic meaning is attained by the reflection of those of a very sacred disposition, bhāgavatottamās. This verse is evidently a restatement of the discipline given by the very first verse of the work: 'The disposition of identity, that is, equipoise, occurs only through the grace of the Lord'. This point is further discussed under the head 'Discipline leading to liberation' in later pages.

The capacity to fix the heart of the Vedic meaning is a mark of great spirituality. It is not the property of all. Fixing is determining. Determining is the process of evaluation. Evaluation is the process of enquiry into the sound and unsound ideas in their distinction. The same is called enquiry into Brahman, Brahma-jijnāsā. This is Vedānta, the process of fixing the meaning of Veda. It is not mere Veda-vāda that is enough to understand truth. It must be coupled with Vedānta-vāda. The indispensable unity of these two is expressed as 'By those that are absorbed in the process of thinking consisting of Veda and Vedānta.' Lord Dattātreyā clearly indicates the greatness or the complexity of this thinking at the very outset. He declares that what he is expounding is the quintessence of Vedānta in all its details. It is thus the truth, what one is supposed to possess after the correct understanding and appreciation of the very essence of Vedānta. What he teaches is not one view of the several views that may be based upon the essence of Vedānta. It is rather the whole view without giving room for any other possibility. It is all that is to be realised, sarvasva.

The theory of knowledge underlying this teaching thus gives the aspirant that truth which is all-inclusive, having nothing beyond itself. This is how it establishes the truth of equipoise, samarasa.

II. Ontology: The Theory of Being

The Ontology of Avadhūta-Gītā may be studied under two heads: the empirical and the absolute.

1. The Empirical Reality: The world consisting of manifold aspects, spirits, that is, the individual selves and matter consisting of all that is non-spirit, is the subject matter of this study. To decide the subject matter and to define it is of very great significance in philosophical thinking. The present discourse presupposes that the world with all its different aspects, irreducible in character, presents an organised and unitary system following its own law and order. The recognition of the world as an orderly system is the one significance of the expressions like 'Know that the whole world is . . .' ⁽²¹⁵⁾, 'The whole world is presented to be . . .' ⁽²¹⁶⁾, 'The whole world is of the five-fold element' ⁽²¹⁷⁾, and so on. In those passages an emphasis is laid on the concept of the whole. It is an expression of the recognition of the world as an orderly system.

(1) The World of Material Objects. The material objects are reduced to five elements. earth, water, fire, air and ether. ⁽²¹⁸⁾ They are characterised by attributes like sound and so on. ⁽²¹⁹⁾ But this does not mean that this position is similar to that of Vaiśeṣika. Consistently with the other ideas connected with the material world, the ideas like prakṛti and mahat, the expression sound and so on must be taken to be the language of subtle elements, tanmātrās. Along with the tanmātrās the eleven organs, indriyas, five motor, five sensory and mind, manas, may be taken up consistently with the spirit of the outlook that governs the whole thought. All these entities have their origin in what is called ahamkāra-tattva which in its turn has its origin in mahat-tattva. This is indicated by the author's statement. 'The world beginning with mahat', ⁽²²⁰⁾ and so on. The spirit of this statement makes it clear that the world consisting of these items is the object of common experience, because it is this world that is said not to appear in the case of the philosopher, avadhūta. He says, 'Nothing of the world beginning with mahat and so on appears to me.' ⁽²²¹⁾ This world has its origin in the root matter called prakṛti. The root matter consists of three factors, satva, rajas and tamas. The theory of causal relation that governs the whole thought is evidently what may be called existent-product-theory, sat-kāryavāda, upholding at the same time God's wonderful creatorship. The world beginning with mahat-tattva is the object of experience. It is therefore manifested, vyakta. The non-manifested, avyakta is its cause. It is the root matter, prakṛti. God is the origin of both the root matter, prakṛti and its evolution. God is the maintainer and the destroyer of all. This is clear from the very expressions such as 'The whole world beginning with mahat-tattva'⁽²²²⁾; 'The manifested is the whole world and the non-manifested is the root matter, prakṛti'⁽²²³⁾; 'All this is made by the self'⁽²²⁴⁾; 'By the mere fact of the Lord all this of moving and non-moving entities is produced, it exists and is destroyed.'⁽²²⁵⁾

The whole world consisting of these various elements exists in space and time. Space is extension. It gives extendedness to the things existing in it. Time is duration. It gives duration to the things existing in it. Of the two, time and space, time is taken to be the origin of space. The author says, 'Without time space does not exist'.⁽²²⁶⁾ The process of the world is beginningless and endless to a superficial mind. But to a man of wisdom everything however enduring it may appear to be has a definite beginning and end. This is the implication of the passages such as, 'There are neither the Vedas, nor the world, nor the Gods . . . Brahman alone is the only Reality',⁽²²⁷⁾ and 'The surface is illusion. The middle is correct knowledge. The truth ought to be understood as being in the heart of the middle'.⁽²²⁸⁾

(ii) The Individual Self: An individual self is called in Sanskrit, jīva. It is essentially a knower. It is in a body. If it is taken to be confined to the body in which it is housed, it is considered to be an individual having other individual selves on the one hand and the whole of the material world on the other set over against it. Its body is made of the five elements.⁽²²⁹⁾ It is signified as 'I'. It is supposed to be the doer and enjoyer of the results of its doing. The narrow outlook of the individual self causes distinction between different items of action. In these circumstances some action is identified as auspicious and some other inauspicious. In this connection 'doership' and 'enjoyership' are superimposed on the individual. Each of its actions is traced to some past action and it is supposed to have a reference to future action. To explain this chain of action, past, present and future continuity of the world is posited. This is implied in the following passage in which the author points out that it is a wrong view.

'Of the action, past, present and future, I am not the doer. Nor am I the enjoyer. This is my realisation giving no room for doubt.'⁽²³⁰⁾ The man being ignorant of truth finally assumes that action is beginningless and endless. The whole cause of life is thus made an assumption and a super-imposition. All about reality is forgotten. Appearance is mistaken for reality. Reality that transcends appearance is denied. The egotistic tendency in the individual self finds no bound. The whole life has thus become an aggregate of baseless imaginations and illusions. Under this condition different theories of the individual self and its enduring character are expounded and they are made popular and thus unconsciously or consciously an attempt is made to keep away the whole of humanity from truth.

Illusion is suffering. Life is nothing but illusion. Illusion is not passive. It breeds further illusion. There is finally the illusion that mistakes misery for happiness. With it different items of miseries are selected and encouraged. It is thought that there is nothing higher than what man can do. Even the possibility of real happiness is completely forgotten.

Placed in this predicament an individual self is supposed to go from one body to another. Receiving a new body is birth. Leaving it is death. Thus a secondary meaning is attributed to birth and death and its enduring character is emphasised. It is supposed that it is by its own merit constantly engaged in ceaseless movements. The Lord in condemnation of a view like this says 'O Mind! Why do you, being deluded, run away like a ghost?'⁽²³¹⁾ An individual self is thus in endless bondage. It falsely hopes to get release by means of certain other delusions which only bind it further without the question of releasing it. The Lord explains this point in all its details in the course of his teaching.

(iii) The Individual Self and Society: This world and the other worlds. The discourse of the Avadhūta-Gītā refers to a definite social life which is highly evolved with all the developments of cultural and spiritual institutions. An individual begins his life in a family from a father and in the womb of a mother. He has the environment in which he can lead a life according to the satisfaction of his desire. In childhood he is engaged in innocent activities. In youth he is after worldly pleasures. In adult life he has his own way of doing things having all the comforts of a house, servants and so on. He has a party to serve and a party to defeat. He has the partnership of a wife to enrich life and for posterity. He belongs to a caste and community or he is casteless. He belongs to a definite order of life and he follows a definite discipline (varṇa and āśrama). He has his own relatives to serve and enemies to destroy. He has the power to inflict injury on others or to give protection and comfort. He is engaged in sacrifice. The Gods are pleased with it. There is the Veda to give him this knowledge. He has the capacity to interpret things to suit his convenience. He has the good, puruṣārthas, to realise in the form of duty, wealth, desire and liberation (dharma, artha, kāma and mokṣa). To realise each of these he has definite institutions. There is a definite code of good and bad actions. Good actions give rise to merit, punya, in the doer. The bad ones cause demerit, pāpa. Merit takes the individual after death to the world of happiness, and demerit to the world of misery. Accordingly the paths are defined. The path of smoke, dhūma-mārga takes one to hell; and the path of light, dīpti-mārga, to heaven, svarga.⁽²³²⁾ Everything is thus in its place. Law and order govern everything. One can safely depend upon things around one with a sense of security. There is the system of preceptor and student and education to help knowledge. Above all there is wealth to give every comfort.⁽²³³⁾ Added to this the mind is capable of creating happiness and a happy environment.⁽²³⁴⁾ What more do we expect from civilisation? What need is there to bother about ideas that are away from this world of here and now?

(iv) From asat to sat (Lead me from the unreal to the real). From the empirical to the transcendent: from appearance to reality: from the individual to the universal.

Lord Dattātreya effectively opposes a view like the above with regard to the reality of life. 'Having left the immortal self which is no other than the state of equipoise, the imperishable freedom, this crow-like man has gone astray preparing himself to go to hell.'⁽²³⁵⁾

He points out how foolish it is to think that life here is all that exists. He illustrates how it is fallacious to hold that the highest organisations can bring us happiness. He shows how the very idea of the beginning of life and its direction has nothing commendable in it. By way of illustrating this idea he says: 'That, such as excretion, is the fearful hell. The secret organ is made of the same stuff. Why do you not see? O mind! Why do you run into it?'⁽²³⁶⁾ He asks the man of the world to reflect a little if he can really convert misery into happiness.

He notes a fundamental defect in the empirical view of things however promising it may appear to be. He says 'Beginning with duty and ending with liberation we have absolutely no desire to attain to anything. How can the men of wisdom imagine things on the basis of attachment and detachment?'⁽²³⁷⁾ His idea is that all empirical organisations are utterly irrelevant to a person who is indifferent to them. But can a man of the world be indifferent to the truth? Can his illusion give him real solace in life?

The Lord at the same time illustrates how all the high concepts made use of by a man of empirical interest are hollow and are far removed from truth. He says: 'It is not the same as release. It is not the same as bondage. It is not the same as merit. It is not the same as demerit. It is not the same as fullness. It is not the same as poverty. It is all equipoise. Why do you bother in mind about its nature?'⁽²³⁸⁾

So he asks the student to find out and understand the truth, the absolute state of equipoise, sarvasama.

(v) The World of Reality Is knowledge of Reality possible? This question is inevitable. Everything that we know is unreal. The previous considerations have led us to this conclusion. All we know is unreal. Our knowledge is unreal. We ourselves are unreal. Everything connected with us is unreal. All our reflections are therefore unreal and our conclusions are unreal. How is then the knowledge of reality possible? How can the knowledge which is unreal in itself present the real? If all that is is unreal, then to whom should the knowledge present the real? What is the status of knowledge in this circumstance? Considerations like these are involved in the original question. Is knowledge of reality possible?

The Lord's answer to this question is found in the two concluding verses of the first chapter. He notes there that there is no source of the knowledge of reality except the proper preceptor. The real preceptor is he who is absorbed in the state of equipoise, sama-rasa-magna, purified by meditation, bhāvita-pūta, and philosopher, avadhūta. In the light of Brhad-āraṇyaka-Upaniṣad, the state of equipoise, sama, is the highest truth. Equipoise is the essence of Reality. The preceptor is one who is merged in this essence. Because of this circumstance his whole life is holy. He has nothing worldly in him. He is a philosopher. Instruction pertaining to the nature of reality must come from him.

The Lord defines the nature of this instruction as being based on 'knowledge in essence' brought to light by philosophy. This knowledge is a case of spontaneity. It is conditioned by nothing empirical. It is ever there. It shines all in all when the empirical life ceases to operate. Philosophy is its presupposition. In the light of the present teaching knowledge stands for two ideas. (1) Knowledge behind philosophy and (2) Knowledge resulting from the study of philosophy. The identity of these two cases of knowledge is signified by the whole expression of these two ideas. 'Knowledge in its essence' is thus the basis of philosophy though it is said to be manifest from the latter.

So the whole cause of knowledge is 'knowledge in its essence'. How is then this knowledge different from ordinary knowledge?

The Lord's answer is that it is different. Though it is said to have its origin in philosophy, it is spontaneity. For this reason philosophy partakes of its nature. Nothing empirical can be identical with this. The implication of this position is very great. Without philosophy human reason appears to solve all problems. Some aspect of this attempt is generally called philosophy. Whatever the depth of this philosophy be, from the standpoint of philosophy recognised by the Lord, it goes counter to the latter. Its origin is individual experience with all its limitations and relative character. It can never approach reality. But yet there is the talk of reality in it. Most of the attributes of reality are considered by it. But it still remains a mere talk. It consists in the end of plain words as the meaning of a word and in this circumstance is necessarily bound to have only an empirical significance. If a person who serves a master to attain selfish ends and who has become expert in this direction, happens to think of God, he thinks of Him only in terms of his experience, that is, as one who helps him to achieve his selfish ends. The real idea of God never occurs to his mind. It is in fact meaningless to him, as he is seriously attached to what he thinks.

With reference to his thought the word God is borrowed but the meaning is his own. Somebody may tell him the meaning, but what is said is nothing but a word and he has his own meaning for it. It is indeed difficult to escape from this web. Explanation borrows words and words are taken to have only the meaning that never goes beyond individual limits. Take the case of happiness for example. To a man of commonsense, happiness is material. If he were to hear that liberation gives happiness he may use the same expression, better than the teacher, but the happiness he attributes to it is nothing beyond the empirical.

In the light of these considerations it is possible to see that in all the philosophy that we generally talk of there is nothing but the process of learning new words for old ideas and in some cases an imaginary extension of the ideas. For instance we are familiar with a human ruler. On this basis the world ruler is imagined and he is called God. This is nothing but the extension of the ideas connected with ruling. On the analogy of a human ruler God is imagined. He is therefore similar to a human ruler. God as absolute ruler is never understood.

In what we call scientific learning there is the increase of the objective items, but no corresponding increase of knowledge. In such cases what is learnt is the same, that is, the law, the principle and the application of knowledge are the same and the objective contents are different. So even though the knowledge of science is supposed to grow, man is not developed. He is the same. From the point of view of knowledge he has never gone far from the starting point.

Similarly in other cases of knowledge he has only developed his imagination but not knowledge. At best he knows only how to please others with his fine imagination, expression and experiment. But he has no peace within himself. His different faculties are constantly at war with themselves. He does not accept what he believes. His imagination may be appreciated by others, but is a burden to him. He prescribes things for others but he never follows them. He is a teacher, but his teaching is of no avail to him. No peace comes out of it. To be of a civilisation or not of it makes no difference in this circumstance, because materially all civilisations are the same, because as they are they do not transcend empirical import.

Empirical knowledge is in truth no knowledge. Knowledge in the real sense is the identity of philosophy and 'knowledge in its essence'. The latter without the former is uncontrolled and the former without the latter is myopic. The identity of the two is life itself. It is the gift of knowledge. In the case of empirical knowledge there is no relation between the two. One does not lead to the other. Empirical life is therefore of no knowledge and of no reality. All this is illustrated in the course of this teaching in greater detail.

Knowledge: Of the two limbs of knowledge, philosophy and 'knowledge in essence', in understanding the nature of knowledge the latter must not be made the starting point. To start from 'knowledge in its essence' ends in subjectivism as it gives no room for the objective test. One therefore ought to start from philosophy and arrive at 'knowledge in its essence' in its light. This is the significance of the Lord's insistence on the point that 'knowledge in its essence' ought to be manifested by philosophy. This is not to make the former dependent on the latter. But it is to remove possible errors that may be committed in the individual interests. 'Knowledge in its essence' being the same in all circumstances the disciplined approach to it is more appropriate than the undisciplined one. Further without discipline which is no other than philosophy 'knowledge in its essence' can never be conceived. Philosophy is therefore indispensable.

What is philosophy? To begin with it must transcend all that is empirical consisting in their broad sense of the fields of perception, inference and verbal testimony called instruction, upadeśa. Its subject matter must be that one reality underlying all reality without exception. It must have no other interest.

Of the three sources of knowledge, perception and inference are governed by our likes and dislikes, but the case of verbal testimony is different. In empirical life its meaning is conditioned by empirical ways of thinking and in this circumstance the verbal testimony is not left to itself. If a person were to put to himself the question—What I understand to be the meaning of the word in question is attributed by me to the word; if so what is the real meaning of the word? Then the person has mentally entered into the field of the non-empirical. To put this question effectively the person must have studied the whole field of human language and reduced it to a system with the governing principle of the whole system. He must at the same time see that the relation between the word and its meaning is spontaneous being subject to nobody's will. If he is able to attain to this position, then only is he able to appreciate the function of verbal testimony in the scheme of knowledge. This frame of mind is sure proof that this is a case of realisation. It is the ability to recognise Veda as Veda.

Veda is not limited by experience. It is therefore the one source of the knowledge of the Ultimate. To be the source of this knowledge it needs to be recognised as Veda. This is the recognition of the distinctive feature of Veda. Veda is impersonal. It comes from no author. It is self-established. For there is no author to give it validity. It presupposes nothing and is followed by nothing. Hence it is eternal and indispensable. It is for this reason signified in Sanskrit as apauruṣeya, impersonal, svataḥ-pramāṇa, self-valid, and nitya, eternal and indispensable.

The term Veda is not something that can be applied to any piece of literature. It cannot be applied to an instruction, a revelation or a revealed scripture, because all these presuppose experience. Without experience or the knowledge of the taught there is no instruction. Further a revelation needs to be intelligible. This is to admit that the meaning of revelation is already familiar to the person to whom revelation occurs. Veda is therefore profoundly different from revelation. Veda comes from the root vid to discover. It is therefore something the meaning of which is to be found out. The process of finding out the meaning is called Vedānta. Veda and Vedānta are therefore one in purpose. Without Veda, Vedānta has no occasion. But without Vedānta, Veda has no purpose to serve. This means that Veda and Vedānta must exist in a single mind. The absence of the one means the absence of the other. If they are, then they are together. Otherwise they are not. Learning Veda without Vedānta is not to have Veda. It is the negation of Veda. Learning Vedānta without Veda is irrelevant. It is therefore the negation of Vedānta. Both are thus together or they are together absent. The popular idea that one knows Veda and the other Vedānta and so on is not based on truth because it creates a gulf between Veda and Vedānta. Sound knowledge requires a careful study of both by the same person. To find out the meaning of Veda is to see harmony in the whole of Veda with reference to a single meaning. The meaning of a Vedic word therefore must be such that it must be completely in harmony with the rest of the Vedic teaching.

From this point of view, even perception and inference which were once supposed to go against Veda come to have a fresh significance and with this significance they become one with Veda. The observation that experience consisting of perception and inference is limited refers only to that circumstance which does not give room for Veda. But in the presence of Veda these two sources of knowledge gain fresh significance and with this, life becomes completely spiritualised. In this circumstance what is presented by perception and inference is an aspect of Truth and it is no longer second to truth. The same body perceived at the empirical level is something opposed to Truth. Against Truth it demands selfishness. The same body perceived at the spiritual level amplifies truth, because then it illustrates omniscience and the omnipotence of Truth. Similarly a position reasoned out at the empirical level is not higher than imagination and it has reference to a relative idea. Take for instance the God inferred as the author of the world. Though it is called God on the empirical level it is in no way better than a pot-maker having all his limitations. But God as the author of the world on the spiritual level is purely transcendent and beyond limitation.

So Vedānta is the language of harmony in the Vedic teaching. With regard to finding out harmony apparently two standpoints offer themselves — non-duality, advaita and duality, dvaita. Lord Dattātreyā accepts neither. He rather asks us not to bother about them. He seriously asks how can one be free from duality and non-duality if one continually engages one's self in knowledge and non-knowledge? ⁽²³⁹⁾

Against these view-points he emphasises the outlook of equipoise. In the light of Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka Upaniṣad this view-point is free from all prejudice. Duality and non-duality find in it equal recognition. Neither is sacrificed for the sake of the other. Neither is over emphasised. The state of equipoise is the truth that pervades through all of the grades of reality, including duality and non-duality. The author defines the man of wisdom, the philosopher, as absorbed in the essence of truth, that is, equipoise.

Viewed from the point of view of the state of equipoise Veda with reference to verbal meaning without insight needs to be transcended. It is for this reason in the concluding verses of several chapters the Lord reminds the student of the insufficiency of Veda and in this connection he commends the importance of teaching of the philosopher who is avadhūta, the outcome of 'knowledge in its essence' based on philosophy.

The present work Avadhūta-Gītā is an example of this. It does not replace Veda. It rather emphasises the importance and indispensability of Veda and Vedānta. All this is the necessary implication of basing 'knowledge in its essence' on philosophy. This implication is further justified by the fact that the Lord calls the Truth he expounds Brahman as it is clear from passages like 'It is established that all this is Brahman. Śruti teaches the same truth in various ways.' ⁽²⁴⁰⁾

2. The Absolute: Brahman

Lord Dattātreyā brings out the significance of the concept of Brahma by various expressions such as equipoise, sama, equipoise-essence, sama-rasa, knowledge immortal, jñānāmṛta, self, Ātman, I, aham, the highest, paramam, the Reality, tattvam, the auspicious, śiva, and so on. Each of these words has its individual significance. It shines absolutely in its own context. Each idea he makes use of is an exposition of the relevant Vedic position. His exposition of Brahman or of Vedic thought tolerates no dualism. At the same time it is far from barren non-duality or identity. His is of the essence of equipoise which is all inclusive and all transcendent. It is the one possible explanation of all that exists in various ways. Nothing in existence is opposed to it and nothing is an addition to it. World or no world it is the same. Apart from it there is nothing. There is nothing with it. Even non-knowledge and illusion are not outside it. Pleasure, pain and such other qualities as well as relative nature do not fall outside it. It is the essence of equipoise in the most exhaustive sense. It is the only explanation of the universe. It is not auspicious as opposed to the inauspicious. It is complete. It pervades all. Its auspicious character is such that the auspicious and inauspicious are the same to It. It is not the mere creator and sustainer of the universe. It is the essence of the universe. It is devoid of internal and external distinctions. As being the essence of equipoise, It is beyond comprehension and beyond exposition. To say that It is 'this' is wrong, because it presupposes distinction of 'that'. To say that It has no distinction is wrong because it presupposes the distinction of that which has distinction. To say that It is the creator is wrong because it presupposes the created apart from It. To say that It is the ruler is wrong because it presupposes the ruled. There is for the same reason no self that knows It, meditates upon It, reflects upon It and realises It. It has nothing objective in it because it is the very essence of the subject. It is not something known, meditated upon, reflected on and realised. It is a unity admitting of no division. It is in itself distinctionless. It is partless, akhaṇḍa, complete, pūrṇa and self-established, eka, establishing all in the same circumstance.⁽²⁴¹⁾

The world considered to be different from It is unreal. That which modifies It is unreal. That which goes against It is unreal. That which does not recognise It, does not amplify It and make It all in all is unreal. That which goes with It is Itself. It is the all-absorbing Reality. The Lord illustrates this Truth by the example of space. This is only an illustration and it has all the limitations of an illustration. Though the world appears to have its own individuality, it is not without the element in it which finally negates it and in its place installs Brahman, the all-reality. Looked at properly, everything, whatever its disposition may be, is an evidence of this highest truth.⁽²⁴²⁾

The Lord's study of Brahman can be brought under two heads: the proof and the conclusion.

Proof:—There are in the world all aspects of reality with all shades. Certain entities are apparent and certain others are non-apparent. Some are relative and some appear to be absolute. Some are good and some are evil. Some are auspicious and some are non-auspicious. Some have binding effect and some appear to effect freedom. Some entities are limited and some appear to be unlimited. Some are opposed to truth and some are unopposed. Some appear to be spiritual and some non-spiritual. Some are divine and some are non-divine. Some are rational and some are irrational. Some are real and some are illusory.

Each of these conflicting elements has its own place in life. Each location is equally significant with others. Each is as indispensable as others. Each is relative to others. Relativity is the law of existence. Even the so called non-relative is relative to the relative. The so-called absolute is relative to the non-absolute. There is nothing that falls outside the system. Even illusion has its own place and it has to fulfil a definite purpose. The removal of it ensures knowledge. Similarly without misery happiness is not promised.

The contents of the world may be relative. But what is the status of the world as a whole? The Lord's answer is that it is equally relative—the relative world being related to the absolute world and vice-versa. Supposing that this absolute is called God, it is easy to see that He is after all relative to the relative world. He is therefore no God. All the same there is this idea of God operating in different minds based purely on imagination. This is also an item of the world. The ideas of worship and so on are the contents of this item. They are all with all their circumstances nothing but imagination.

Thus the contents of the world are relative. The ideas are relative. The world is relative. Unity, identity, non-duality and duality are relative. Even to say that they are relative is relative.

Does the relative exist by itself? Does it establish itself? 'No' says the Lord. The relative existing by itself is a contradiction in terms. The non-relative is therefore the explanation of the relative. The non-relative is God. In the very opening passage of the Avadhūta-Gītā he definitely concludes that all circumstances of an individual self and its realisations are the work of God. The circumstance and realisation of an individual self comprise all that exist because being relative it presupposes all that is relative to it. It is all the work of God. Without God there is neither circumstance nor realisation. God is therefore the explanation of all. This means that the relative exists in the non-relative. The non-relative is necessarily beyond all that is relative. It is God. If anything relative is introduced into it, then it falls short of God and becomes a mere idea like other ideas that are the content of the world. The truth of God is therefore such that it establishes the relative without Itself being relative in any sense.

After expounding the non-relative character of God the Lord takes up the question of the relation of God to the world. Is God related to the world? To hold any relation is to bring down God to the level of the world. One cannot be blind to the implication of this proposition. If God is brought to a lower plane it simply means that the problem of finding the source of all remains the same. That which is relative in any sense cannot be the source of all. So he discards all relative ideas and points out that God is that by which all this is filled up by means of Itself in Itself. Its non-relative character is such that once you understand It then you do not see anything else. It is all identity. It is the self of all. It is all pervading. It is all identity. It is self-existence. It is at the same time the maker of the relative. This is its wonderful power. The relative does not exist as a second to God. It is the mark of the wonderful capacity of God. As such, the relative is the mark of God. If once God is understood then there is no longer the relative, because it is then the world of 'all', that is, God. This is the Truth of Self, Ātman. To understand this is to see that all this is God, that is, Brahman. It is the truth of equipoise, Sama.

Conclusion:—The Lord points out that to understand this Truth by the study of philosophy is to see the very essence of Vedānta, vedānta-sāra-sarvasva. The essence of Vedānta is the following: Equipoise, sama is the truth complete. It is complete in the sense that It is all and there is nothing outside It. But It does not negate all, because in the face of negation of all there is no occasion to establish It. It is devoid of all the implications of the concepts, duality and identity.⁽²⁴³⁾ Duality negates the complete. Identity makes the complete non-operative. But the Truth is complete. As complete, the Truth itself negates duality and identity. The Lord observes 'The imagination of duality and identity is indeed the greatest of the delusions.'⁽²⁴⁴⁾ He says 'How can I say that all this is identity or duality?'⁽²⁴⁵⁾ and concludes that the Truth is knowledge immortal, the essence of equipoise, comparable to space⁽²⁴⁶⁾, that is, untainted and the real self in every individual. He characterises this truth as 'That which presupposes nothing and admits of no cause behind it.'⁽²⁴⁷⁾ It is for this reason the auspicious of the auspicious.

III THE THEORY OF LIBERATION, MOKṢA

The Lord defines liberation as the unconditioned existence characterised by equipoise, having no beginning and end and transcending knowledge as such.⁽²⁴⁸⁾ It is beyond everything that is relative. In this state there is neither knowledge nor non-knowledge.

It is a state of all enduring awareness. It is free from all defects. It is auspiciousness itself. It is more than the state of bliss. It is equipoise. It is untainted by relativity in any sense. It is absolutely immediate. It has nothing mediate in it. It is knowledge in its essence, svabhāva-bhāva. It is pure existence, being complete in itself. It is the self, Ātman. It is Brahman.

THE DISCIPLINE LEADING TO MOKṢA

Lord Dattātreyā sees no meaning in the conceptions of discipline made popular by various Darśanas such as yoga with its six limbs, instructions by preceptors and institutional morality. He sees that they are irrelevant to the truth of self, Ātman which is pure in itself. He says:—

‘That which is pure is not attained by means of the discipline of yoga with its six limbs. Nor is it attained by the destruction of the mind. Not is it attained by the instruction of a preceptor. Verily it is Itself. It is the Reality. It is self-established.’⁽²⁴⁹⁾ Knowledge does not lead to it. Reasoning does not help it. No meditation, no discipline and no spatial and temporal conditions make it realised. There is no preceptor to teach it. It is knowledge in its essence. It is ‘I’. It is Reality. It is untainted even as space is. It is self-established. It is ever enduring. The Lord says:—

‘This knowledge is not of the character of human reasoning, nor is it the meditation prescribed by yoga. It does not presuppose particular space and time. It is not obtained by means of the instruction of a preceptor. It is consciousness itself. It is reality. It is like space. It is spontaneity. It is stable.’⁽²⁵⁰⁾

In order to understand it one ought to be free from attachment and hatred. To do good to others must be the very disposition of this one. One’s knowledge of the Truth must be beyond doubt. The Lord says:—

‘The person who is free from attachment and hatred, who is intent upon doing good to all creatures, whose knowledge is stable and who is irresistible attains the highest Truth.’⁽²⁵¹⁾

One must possess wisdom. One must be able to appreciate the Truth beyond conception, beyond relativity, the Truth which shines beyond all and is in itself. The Lord says:—

‘Spontaneous, unborn, ununderstandable is the essence. If one realises it and to one’s entire satisfaction enjoys it, then one is never tainted by defects. Merely because this realisation has not occurred even once, one ought not to do any action. This is how a mendicant or a person who practises austerity is not bound.'⁽²⁵²⁾

There is no use of a blind study of even Veda. There is no use of practising any religion with great devotion. There is no use in following the instructions of particular teachers. The Truth is beyond all this. The Lord observes:—

'There is required no Veda, no discipline, no sacrifice connected with removing hair, no teacher, no pupil, no wealth of different kinds and no religious marks. That is the Lord Self, Ātman, the all-enduring. It he attains to.'⁽²⁵³⁾

To speak of liberation in terms of bliss betrays one's self-interest. In a sense it is an expression of the narrow individuality. Liberation is therefore beyond bliss.

One must be very careful in following all these ideas. The Truth is equipoise. It is beyond all relativity. It transcends even the state of equipoise in case it has in its purview anything relative. It is beyond all Gods. The God who stands outside the creation in any sense is no God. The God who is considered to be within the heart of the world may after all be relative to the world. He is therefore no God. The God who is incapable of giving rise to the universe without in any sense being modified by the creation, the God who is incapable of explaining all aspects of the world, good and evil, right and wrong, real and unreal without giving room for duality in any sense is no God. To hold that God is the only reality, to hold that the world is unreal or to hold that God is a mere abstract does not solve the problem of God or of the world. To concentrate on God in an exclusive sense is unwarranted, because God must be all-inclusive and all-explanatory. To deny the world is to deny God, because with the denial of the world the problem of having a God is denied. The consideration of the reality or the unreality of the world for its own sake is not justified unless it has in view the establishment of the truth of equipoise. The Lord compares the world to a mirage, only to illustrate the absolute character of the truth of equipoise. If this truth is appreciated then the questions of duality and identity lose their significance. Realisation of this truth has a practical importance. With this realisation the common ways of worship, meditation and discipline disappear and in their place contemplation on the truth of equipoise emerges slowly. With more and more of realisation the same pristine and venerable expressions like 'equipoise' and others gain more and more significance. Thus to a discerning eye there is throughout a systematic growth of spiritual discipline presented by the Lord. The discourse therefore mirrors the spiritual growth of the person in question.

The Truth of equipoise mercilessly demands a way of life consistent with it, a way of life that leads to its realisation, and a way of life by which the person attains to this truth. The Lord notes that the truth is the highest Reality which is not relative even to the relation of the teacher and the taught.⁽²⁶⁴⁾ He insists thereby that what usually takes place between a teacher and a pupil is irrelevant to truth, because truth is all transcendent.

The Lord has so far indicated the negative aspect of the discipline. What we have to note in this connection is that what is negated by the Lord is not so much the negation of the particular words, knowledge, preceptor and so on, but it is the negation of the thought behind these expressions. With the correct understanding of the truth all these terms become retained with a fresh significance. An appreciation of this aspect of the teaching has a great disciplinary significance. A word by itself is innocent. It is neither the cause of happiness nor of misery. This is the circumstance connected with even those words that figure in the expression of opposites such as happiness and misery; reality and unreality; good and evil and so on. In these cases the real opposition is not between words but between meanings attached to them. It is therefore the meaning that is the cause of different emotions. But commonly the words are made much of and the effect of the meaning is totally ignored. Such is the case with duality, identity and so on. When the Lord says that the truth is not this nor that he is considering the meanings of the words, but never the words themselves. He is prepared even to reject the term 'equipoise', sama, if a lower or relative meaning is attached to it; and he is in the same breath prepared to signify the Truth as identity, advaita or duality, dvaita, provided the correct meaning is apprehended. It must not be forgotten that after all he is out to determine the meaning of Veda having the whole of Veda in view. He readily respects all words provided the meaning is truly Vedic, that is, it is truly the expression of the truth of equipoise, sama, the absolute of the absolutes.

The philosophy of 'equipoise', samarasa, is in no sense forced on the Vedānta thought. As it is already noted, Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka-Upaniṣad expounds this truth as the meaning of the whole Veda.

The same is substantiated in the Avadhūta-Gītā. To understand this is to see the unity of thought both in Śruti and in Smṛti. Not to see the unity of thought in them is often due to the mistake of trying to draw too close a distinction between duality and identity. Of the two, duality and identity, both are true and both are false. The history of Vedānta thought illustrates this point. Men of wisdom have from the beginning insisted on the perfect unity of the Vedic thought. This is beautifully illustrated by the Yoga-Vāsistha —

'Duality and identity are innate even as a tree is innate in the body of the seed. One who sees the world beginning with cit (the Ultimate Truth) and ending with an atom (an insignificant thing) (with an outlook consistent with this truth) is one who really sees' (255)

'Neither duality nor identity neither the seed nor the sprout neither the gross nor the subtle is not non-born, but it is really born' (256)

Neither duality nor non-duality is therefore the truth. Each is born. Each is the work of the imagination. Each is the negation of truth. The philosophy of the Vedas is therefore neither duality nor identity. It is the philosophy of equipoise, sama, as the Brhad-Āraṇyaka Upaniṣad puts it. The same is the philosophy that Dattātreyā has expounded in the Avadhūta-Gītā.

It is with the background of these ideas that the positive side of the Lord's teaching can be appreciated. He says 'Avadhūta absorbed in the essence of identity and purified by the contemplation over it expounds carefully this highest truth' (257). One must realise that this is a serious discourse. In recognition of the seriousness and purity of the exposition, the Lord calls it the highest and purest, pralāpāna. He notes thereby that the usual instructions never help correct understanding. He says —

From the guru to whom this discourse is given, to him the Reality, equipoise, shines itself' (258). So he distinguishes the real preceptor from the false one. The reason he has already given for this is to be kept ever in the mind.

This is expounded on the strength of 'knowledge in essence' based on philosophy' (259).

All this means that without the proper preceptor it is not possible to understand the truth. Mere imagination or system-making according to individual taste does not help knowledge. To a person who is prepared to receive instruction, the preceptor is ever there and his instruction is ever ready to help him. Both are presented in what is called Veda and Vedānta together forming a unity of thought.

To approach this aspect of discipline requires purity of heart. This purity is marked by non-attachment to the things of the world including the ideas of the truth. This is detachment of the highest kind. It is the complete absence of the three-fold desire, desire for sons, desire for wealth and desire for woman.

The person who is endowed with detachment must have the devotion to truth, 'equipoise'. The Lord demands: 'Therefore the mind must be protected from all evils. If it is free from worries, then the intellect is able to operate.'⁽²⁶⁰⁾ To the person who is equipped in this manner the Lord says:

'By the Lord Dattātreyā, the philosopher, the embodiment of peace itself is expounded this great truth. Those who study it and appreciate it, to them there is no rebirth.'⁽²⁶¹⁾ After the teaching of the Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka-Upaniṣad 'O dear, Self must be realised, heard, that is, understood, meditated on and appreciated.'⁽²⁶²⁾ This is the one process of discipline leading to liberation, union with Dattātreyā, the essence of equipoise, samarasa.

dattādvaitam param tattvam yathā-mati jayoditam dattasyaivārpitam tat syāt sarvam datta-mayam śivam

'Equipoise which is no other than Datta, that is, Dattātreyā, is the highest truth. As inspired by Him it is expounded by Jaya—Sri Jaya Chamarajendra Wadiyar Bahadur. May it be dedicated to Dattātreyā Himself. All this is Dattātreyā, the Auspicious of the Auspicious.'

O Gods! May we (the seekers) hear with (our ears) the auspicious (truth of Vedānta). May we, the performers (of sacrifice which is no other than meditation) see with our eyes of knowledge the auspicious forms of the truth. May we, who are possessed of organs (drawn away from the external world and fixed) on the subtle truth attain an existence free from defects, of a duration prescribed by Deva (Prajā-pati). May Indra, who is heard of by the ancients contribute towards our welfare. May the omniscient pūsan contribute towards our welfare. May Tārksya unhampered in his flight contribute towards our welfare. Aum. Peace, Peace, Peace.

3. THE AVADHUTA-GĪTĀ

Avadhūta-Gītā is another work composed by Śrī Dattātreyā. It consists of eight chapters comprising in all 289 ślokas (verses) of different metres. The whole work is devoted to expounding self-knowledge, svātma-samvitti. The fourth chapter is given a special title, the Definition of Essence, svarūpa-nirṇaya. The fifth chapter is entitled the exposition of insight into the truth of equipoise, sama-dṛṣṭi-kāthana. The sixth chapter is entitled the determination of liberation, mokṣa, mokṣa-nirṇaya.

The work claims to be an exposition of Vedic thought in the light of the teaching, 'That thou art' and so on. Consistently with this teaching it lays special stress on 'equipoise' in the name of sama, samarasa and so on. The tradition has given the name pure identity, śuddhādvaita, to this system of thought. Though the thought seems to be a variety of identity it has its own individuality. This point will be illustrated in a later section.

The style is Vedic or Upaniṣadic in character. It appears to be simple and commonplace. But closer acquaintance and understanding reveal that it is very difficult to grasp the thought behind it. The thought is profound. To understand it presupposes a careful study of Darśana literature. It is apparently nothing but mere repetition of contradictory ideas but in reality it is a consistent growth of a very complex thought, slowly emerging from identical expressions.

In the following pages an attempt is made to translate the Sanskrit verses. The translation of each verse of the first two chapters is followed by passages from Śruti presenting the same idea. The reason for this is the following. Lord Dattātreyā in the course of his teaching repeatedly reminds the pupil that his teaching is nothing but an exposition of Śruti. In illustration of this idea it is thought that the statement of passages from Śruti may help to show the Śruti basis underlying each verse.

The passages of Śruti are taken only from the well-known ten Upaniṣads and these Upaniṣads are generally recognised to be purely philosophical in character. Judging from the standpoint of these ten Upaniṣads the disposition of Dattātreyā's teaching may be determined.

In his exposition Dattātreyā at times makes use of the identical expressions of Upaniṣads. Sometimes he makes use of similar expressions. In particular connections he explains the position of Śruti. But in all these circumstances he keeps in view the entire Śruti teaching so that he presents nothing independently of Śruti and what he teaches is the very essence of Śruti in its entirety, vedānta-sāra-sarvasva. All this will be indicated in particular contexts of the following exposition.

THE AVADHUTA-GĪTĀ

(Translation and the background of Śruti)

CHAPTER I

1. īśvarānugrahād-eva puṁsāṁ advaita-vāsanā mahadbhaya-paritrāṇāt viprāṇāṁ upajāyate.

‘By God’s grace alone will there arise in men who are inwardly stirred the fragrance of non-duality which will save them from great fear.’ Īśa Upaniṣad. 1: īśāvāsyam idaṁ sarvaṁ yatkinṁ ca jagatyāṁ jagat. ‘All this, whatever exists in this world of becoming, is permeated by the Lord.’ The world is based on God. It is the work of God. Without the actual presence of God it does not exist. The Lord’s pervasion is thus not passive. It is essentially operative. Against It one cannot have effort. What appears to be effort is an expression of disposition. That is the grace of God.

Māṇḍūkya. 7: icchāmātram prabhoh sṛṣṭiḥ

‘The Lord’s creation is a fiat of his will.’ According to Śaṅkara this is Kārikā by Gauḍapāda and according to Madhva this is Māṇḍūkya proper.

Kaṭha (1.2.22): yaṁ evaiṣa vṛṇute tena labhyaḥ.

‘He is obtained by him whom the Lord elects.’

Kaṭha (1.2.20): paśyati . . . dhātu-prasādāt mahimānaṁ ātmanaḥ

‘He sees by means of His (Lord’s) grace the all pervasion of Ātman.’

2. yenedaṁ pūṛitaṁ sarvaṁ ātmanaivātmanātmani
 nirākāraṁ kathaṁ vande hy abhinnaṁ śivaṁ avyayaṁ.

‘That by which all this is filled up is the self, by the same self it is created and in the same self it exists. How indeed can I pay my salutations to that which is formless, non-dual, auspicious and inexhaustible?’

Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka-Upaniṣad, Śanti says: pūrṇasya pūrṇam ādāya pūrṇam eva avaśiṣyate.

‘Take away the complete from the complete. It is still complete.’

This truth is brought out as follows.—

Bṛhad-Āraṅkaya (1.4.17): atmaivedam-agra āsīt eka eva so kāmayate jāyā me syāt . . . ātmaivāśya karma. ātmanā hi karma karoti . . . pāntam idam sarvam yad idam kim ca tad idam sarvam āpnoti. ya evam veda.

'There was only self before the creation of this world. It was one only. It desired 'I must have a wife. . . .' The activity of all this is self itself. It indeed takes place by means of self itself. By the same agency one has activity. . . . (By the same) all this is complete with all the accessories five in number. Whatever there is, all that is complete with all the accessories, that is, it is the work of the pervasion of the self. He who knows this obtains all this.'

Kātha (2.5.14): arūpam . . . katham nu tad vijānīyam.

'It is formless . . . How indeed can I understand it?'

It is further said. neha nānāsti kim ca na

'There is no distinction in it. (Distinction, like one who understands, understanding and the understood).'

Māndūkya 7 śivam advaitam

'It is auspicious and non-dual.'

3. pancabhūtātmakam viśvam marīci-jala-sannibham kasyāpy'aho namas-kuryām aham eko niranjanah.

'The whole universe is nothing but the five elements. It is similar to the water super-imposed on the rays of the sun. To whom indeed shall I pay my salutation? I am the only being that is defectless' Taittirīya (2-1): tasmād vā etasmād ātmana ākāśah sambhūtaḥ. ākāśād vāyuh. vāyor agnih. agner āpah. adbhyah pṛthivī.

'From that self which is expounded here, in this text, ether came. From ether came air. From air came fire. From fire came water. From water came earth' So all that is created by self consists of five elements.

Bṛhad-Āraṅyaka (1.4.1): ātmaivedam agra āsīt. . . . nānyad ātmano apaśyat soham asmity agra vyāharat tato aham nāmābhavat.

'There was only self before this creation. It saw nothing distinct from itself. At the outset it said 'He I am'. Therefore it became the bearer of the name "I". Hence 'I' in this context should not be confused with the individual 'I'.

Mundaka (3.1.3): niranjanah paramam sāmyam upaiti.

'He who realises it becomes defectless and attains to equipoise, the highest Truth.'

Kaṭha (2.3.17): tam vidyāt śukraṁ amṛtaṁ.

'One must understand It (the truth) to be pure and immortal.'

The idea is that the whole world of matter being similar to a mirage is bondage. It is indeed the work of God. To realise this truth is to transcend bondage.

4. ātmaiva kevalaṁ sarvaṁ bhedābhedo na vidyate
asti nāsti kathaṁ brūyāṁ vismayaḥ pratibhāti me.

'All this is nothing but self. There is neither difference, non-difference, nor difference-non-difference. How can I say that it is or is not? I am rapt in wonder.'

Īśa. 6: yas tu sarvāṇi bhūtāni ātmany evānupaśyati. sarva-bhūteṣu cātmānam tato na vijugupsate. yasmin sarvāṇi bhūtāni ātmaivābhūd vijānataḥ.

'He who sees all things in the Ātman and the Ātman in all things is free from all aversion. To one who knows the truth all things become his Self.

Chāndogya (6.2.1): sad eva somyedaṁ agra āsīt.

'O, the aspirant of detachment and devotion. There was only existence before the creation of this.'

Taittirīya (3.7): asad vā idaṁ agra āsīt.

'There was only non-existence before the creation of this world.'

Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka (1.2.1): naiveha kiṁ ca nāgra āsīt.

'There was nothing before creation.'

To put these ideas together makes it impossible to define Self either as is or as is not. The only conclusion is:—

Kaṭha (1.2.7): āścaryo vaktā . . . āścaryo jñātā.

'The speaker of it is a marvel and the one who knows it is a marvel.'

5. vedānta-sāra-sarvasvam jñānaṁ vijñānaṁ eva ca ahaṁ ātmā nirākāraḥ sarvavyāpī svabhāvataḥ.

'What forms the quintessence of Vedānta, what is knowledge or specialised knowledge is of the form "I am Self, formless, all-permeating by my very nature".'

Muṇḍaka (3.2.6): vedānta-vijñāna-suniścitārthāḥ . . . parimucyanti sarve.

'All those to whom the truths of Vedānta have become matters of strong conviction become liberated.'

Chāndogya (4.11.1): sohaṁ asmi sa evāhamasmi.

'That I am. That alone I am.'

Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka (4.4 5). ayam ātmā brahma

'I am self. (I am) Brahman.'

Muṇḍaka: yas sarvajñah sarvavit yasya jñānamayaṁ tapah.

'He who is omniscient and possessor of all is he whose austerity glows with the heat of thought.'

6. yo vai sarvātmako devo niskalo gaganopamah svabhāva-nirmalaś śuddhaḥ sa evāham na saṁśayah.

'That which is indeed all this, shining, partless, space-like, by nature free from defects and pure, that alone I am This admits of no doubt.'

Chāndogya (3.3.14): sarvam khalv idam brahma.

'All this is indeed Brahman.'

Īśa (8). sa paryagāt śukraṁ akāyam avranam asnāvīram śuddham apāpa-viddham

'He, the man of wisdom attained to Brahman which is devoid of all impurities, miseries and short-comings, bodiless, unconditioned both from the standpoint of time and from the standpoint of qualities, in which there are no components of body, which is pure and holy, and for the same reason free from all sins and defects '

7 aham evāvyayonantah śuddha-vijnāna-vigrahaḥ sukhaṁ duḥkhaṁ na jñāmi katham kasyāpi vartate

'Myself alone is that which is indestructible, infinite and of the form which is pure consciousness I know neither pleasure nor pain as in any manner occurring to anything.'

Īśa (16): yo sāv asau puruṣaḥ sohaṁ asmi.

'That which is, is this puruṣa, the principle purely spiritual in character. It I am '

Chāndogya (4.13.1). ya esa vidyuti puruṣo drśyate sohaṁ asmi sa evāhaṁ asmi.

'The same spirit is seen in lightning. That alone I am That, nothing else I am.'

Taittirīya (2.1). satyam jñānam anantaṁ brahma.

'The real, spiritual and infinite is Brahman '

8. na mānasam karma śubhāśubham me na kāyikaṁ karma śubhāśubham me na vācikaṁ karma śubhāśubham me jñānamṛtaṁ śuddham atīndriyoham.

'To me there is no mental act characterised as auspicious or inauspicious There is no bodily activity which is fair or foul. No speaking activity which is pleasing or unpleasing. I am the ambrosia of knowledge which wholly transcends the senses.'

Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka (4.4.23): eṣa-nityo mahimā brāhmaṇasya na vardhate karmanā no kanīyān.

'This is the unfailing greatness of Brāhmaṇa (Brahman) that it does not grow or fade away by means of activity, karma.'

Muṇḍaka (3.1.8): na cakṣuṣā gṛhyate nāpi vācā nānyaiḥ devaiḥ tapasā karmanāvā. jñāna-prasādena viśuddha-satvaḥ tatas tu tam paśyate niṣkalaṁ dhyāyamānaḥ.

'Not apprehended by eye, nor by speech, nor by other Gods, nor by austerity, nor by action. By the grace which is no other than knowledge, one whose existence is purified apprehends it which is distinctionless, following the process of meditation.'

9. mano vai gaganākāraṁ mano vai sarvato mukhaṁ mana atītaṁ manaḥ sarvaṁ na manaḥ paramārthataḥ.

'Mind is indeed like space. Mind is indeed in all directions. Mind transcends all. Mind is all. In fact it is not what is commonly called mind. It is the mind in the absolute sense.'

Kena (1.2): manaso manaḥ.

'It is the mind of the mind, that is, Mind is what it is because of It.

yan manasā na manute yenāhur mano mataṁ tad ēva brahma tvam viddhi nedaṁ yad idaṁ upāsate.

'That which one knows by mind, but by which they say that mind itself is made to have its function, understand thou that alone to be Brahman; but not this which is meditated on, that is, that which is meditated on as the object of mind.'

Chāndogya (3.18.1): mano brahmety upāsita.

'Mind ought to be meditated on as being Brahman.'

What is commonly called mind is therefore no mind. Mind in the real sense is Brahman itself.

10. ahaṁ ekaṁ idaṁ sarvaṁ vyomātitaṁ nirantaram paśyāmi kathaṁ ātmānaṁ pratyakṣaṁ vā tirohitaṁ.

'I am one. (I am) all this. I transcend space. I am devoid of distinction. How can I see the self, supposed to have been perceived or beyond perception?'

Kaṭha-Upaniṣad: kathaṁ nu tadvijānīyāṁ kimu bhāti na bhāti vā.
'How indeed can I know it? It shines and it does not indeed shine.'

Chāndogya-Upanisad (2.1.1): samastasya khalu sāmṇā upāsanam.
'There is only one form of meditation on the complete (Brahman).
It is equipoise.

11. tvam̐ evam̐ ekam̐ hi katham̐ na buddhyase samam̐ hi sarvesu vimr̥ṣtam̐ avyayam̐ sadoditosi tvam̐ akhanditaḥ prabho divā ca naktam̐ ca katham̐ hi manyase.

'Thus you are indeed one. Why do you not realise this? You are the state of equipoise in all. You are searched for. You are inexhaustible. In every circumstance it is you that is expounded. No distinction can be introduced into you. O Lord! Where is the distinction to you as day and night?'

Kena (2.4.12) says: pratibodha-viditam̐.

'It is revealed in every case of knowledge (as the very source of knowledge).'

Katha (2.5.15) says: na tatra sūryo bhāti na candra-tārakam̐ nemā vidyuto bhānti kutoyam̐ agniḥ, tam̐ eva bhāntam̐ anubhāti sarvam̐ tasya bhāsā sarvam̐ idam̐ vibhāti.

'The sun does not shine there, that is, it does not illumine it (the truth): the moon does not and the star does not: these lightnings do not: how can the fire? All this shines following that ever shining truth. By its shining all this shines, that is, it illumines all, but it is illumined by none.'

12. ātmānam̐ satatam̐ viddhi sarvatraikam̐ nirantaram̐ aham̐ dhyātā param̐ dhyeyam̐ akhandam̐ khandyate katham̐.

'Understand self as all-enduring, one underlying many and uninterrupted. I am that which meditates and that which is meditated on. How can the indivisible be divided?'

Kena (2.2.10) says: yo naś tad veda tad veda yo na vedeti ca.

'He who thinks he knows does not know it. He who feels that he does not know it, understands it.' This is because the truth is pratibodha-vidita, the very source of every case of knowledge. How can distinctions, meditation and so on be introduced into it?

13. na jāto na mṛtosi tvam̐ na te dehaḥ kadācana
 sarvam̐ brahmeti vikhyātam̐ bravīti bahudhā śrutih.

'You are never born and you are never dead. You never have a body. It is well established that 'All this is Brahman'. Scripture (Śruti) expounds this Truth in various manners.'

Kaṭha (1.2.18):

na jāyate mriyate vā kadācit nāyaṁ bhūtvā bhavitā vā na bhūyaḥ ajo nityaḥ śāśvatoyaṁ purāṇaḥ na hanyate hanyamāne śarīre.

‘Neither is it born nor does it die. Having become something it does not become something else again. It is beginningless and endless. It is the same though it obtains bodies. It is not destroyed when the body is destroyed.’

Chāndogya (3.13.7): atha yad ataḥ paro divo jyotir dīpyate viśvataḥ prṣṭheṣu sarvataḥ prṣṭheṣu anuttameṣūttameṣu lokeṣvidam vā va tad yadidaṁ asminnantāḥ puruṣe jyotiḥ tasyaisā dṛṣṭih . . .
sarvaṁ khalv idaṁ brahma.

‘Further the light that shines beyond the shining heavens is that which underlies the basis of all, all those entities that are called bases and the worlds higher and lower. It is indeed the light that underlies the self. This is the exposition of this Truth. . . . All this is indeed Brahman.’

14. sa bāhyābhyantarosi tvaṁ śivaḥ sarvatra sarvadā
itas tataḥ katham bhrāntaḥ pradhāvasi piśācavat.

‘That which is outside and inside is yourself. You are auspicious in every circumstance and under all conditions. Why then are you deluded and why do you move hither and thither like a ghost?’

Brhad-Āraṇyaka (2.5.19): tad etat brahma apūrvam anaparam anantaram abāhyaṁ ātmā brahma sarvānubhūḥ.

‘That is this Brahman. It has nothing prior, nothing that follows it, nothing that is different from it, nothing that is inside it, nothing that is outside. It is this self that is Brahman. It is all knowledge.’

Māṇḍūkya (7): prapancopaśamaṁ śāntam śivam advaitam.

‘It is that in which the world has found its rest. It is peace. It is auspicious. It is non-dual, that is, It is the state of equipoise.’

15. saṁyogaś ca viyogaś ca vartate na ca te na me na tvaṁ nāhaṁ jagan nedaṁ sarvaṁ atmaiva kevalam.

‘There is neither relation nor separation to you nor to me. You are not yourself. I am not myself. This world is not itself. All is indeed nothing but Self.’

Chāndogya (3.12.8): ayam vā va sa yoyaṁ antar hr̥daya ākāśaḥ tad etat pūrnam apravartī.

'This is indeed that which underlies the inner heart. It is ākāśa, the shining illumination. That is (all) this. It is the highest and complete. It is effortless.'

Kaṭha (2.4.11): neha nānāsti kiṃ ca na.

'In it there is no distinction in any sense.'

16. śabdādi pancakasyāśya naivāsi tvaṃ na te punah tvaṃ eva paramaṃ tattvaṃ atah kiṃ paritapyase.

'Of this which consists of five subtle elements (sound, touch, colour, taste and odour) you are not. Nor do they partake of your nature. You are the highest truth. Why then do you bother?'

Kaṭha (1.3.15): aśabdaṃ asparsaṃ arūpaṃ avyayaṃ tathārasaṃ nityaṃ agandhavaś ca yat

'The truth is that which is absolutely devoid of sound, absolutely devoid of touch, absolutely devoid of colour, inexhaustible, absolutely devoid of taste, and absolutely devoid of odour.'

Chāndogya (6.16.3). aitadātmyaṃ idaṃ sarvaṃ.

'All this is of this Self, that is, all this has Self as its essence.'

17 janma mṛtyuḥ na te cittaṃ bandha mokṣaś śubhāśubhau kathaṃ roḍiṣi re vatsa nāma rūpaṃ na te na me.

'Birth and death, mind, bondage, release, good and evil are irrelevant to you O Dear! Why do you grieve? Form and name apply neither to you nor to me'

Mundaka Upaniṣad (3.2.8): yathā nadyaḥ syandamānāḥ samudre astaṃ gacchanti nāma-rūpe viḥaya—tathā vidvān nāma-rūpād vimuktaḥ parātparaṃ puruṣaṃ upaiti divyaṃ.

'Even as the flowing rivers disappear in the sea having abandoned name and form, similarly the man of wisdom being absolutely freed from name and form attains to Self, the higher than the highest spirit.'

Chāndogya (7.6.1): dhyānaṃ vā va cittaḥ bhūyah.

'Meditation is greater than mind.'

Kaṭha (2.5.1): vimuktaś ca vimucyate

'He who is already liberated is liberated.'

Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka (4.4.22): nainaṃ kṛtākṛte tapataḥ.

'That which is done and that which is not done do not affect it (Self)'

Chāndogya (2.14.1): ākāśo ha vai nāma-rupayoḥ nirvahiṭā.

'It is this absolute illumination that is indeed the sustainer of name and form.'

18. aho citta katham bhrāntaḥ pradhāvasi piśācavat
abhinnam paśya cātmānam rāga-tyāgāt sukhī bhava.

'O Mind! Being deluded why do you run away like a ghost? Understand the self to be the state of equipoise. Get yourself rid of attachment. Be happy.'

Chāndogya (6.2.1): ekam evādvitīyam.

'It is one only and secondless.'

19. tvam eva tattvam hi vikāra-varjitam niṣkarpam ekam hi vimokṣa-vigraham .
na te ca rāgo hyatha vā virāgaḥ katham hi santapyasi kāma-kāmataḥ.

'You alone are indeed the reality devoid of change, unaffected, One, and of the disposition of complete freedom. Attachment or non-attachment does not indeed apply to you. Why do you worry by giving room for desires?'

Chāndogya (6.16.1): tattvam asi.

'That thou art.'

Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka (1.4.2): dvitīyād vai bhayam bhavati.

'The second is the cause of fear.' But it is advitīya, secondless.

Chāndogya (4.14.3): yathā puṣkara palāśa āpo na śliṣyanta evam evamvidi pāpam karma na śliṣyate.

'Even as water does not stick to the leaf of the lotus creeper, to one who knows the (Truth of Brahman) so far expounded, evil action does not stick.' You are Brahman. How can then attachment or detachment occur to you?

20. vadanti śrutayaḥ sarvāḥ nirguṇam śuddham avyayam aśarīram samam tattvam tan mām viddhi na saṁsayam.

'All Śrutis teach the attributeless, pure, inexhaustible, formless and the truth of equipoise. Understand that to be myself. There is no room for doubt, that is, do not doubt it.'

Kaṣha (2.2.15): sarve vedāḥ yat padam āmananti.

'All Vedas expound that Truth (Brahman).'

Muṇḍaka (2.2.11): brahmaivedam amṛtam.

'This Brahman alone is immortal.'

(2.2.11): Brahmaivedam viśvam.

'This Brahman alone is all.'

(3.2.1): sa vedaitat paramam brahmadhāma yatra viśvam nihitam bhāti subhram.

'He understood the location of this highest Brahman in which the whole universe is given as having found its support, but which shines pure and untainted.'

(3.2.5): samprāpyainam ṛṣayo jñāna-trptāḥ kṛtātmānaḥ vīta-rāgāḥ praśāntāḥ te sarvagam sarvataḥ prāpya dhīrāḥ yuktātmānaḥ sarvam evāviśanti.

'Having attained to Brahman they have become wise, satisfied in wisdom, fully accomplished, free from attachment and peaceful. Having attained to all-pervading Brahman in all, they, the wise have realised all and they have entered into Brahman which is all.'

21. sākāram anṛtam viddhi nirākāram nīrantaram etat tatvopadeśena na punar-bhava-sambhavaḥ.

'Know that which has form is unreal. That which is formless is distinctionless. By receiving the teaching that expounds this reality there is no possibility of rebirth.

Chāndogya (8.15.1): sa khalv evam vartayan yāvad āyusaṁ brahma-lokaṁ abhisampadyate. na ca punar āvartate na ca punar āvartate. 'He indeed thus living, that is, studying, understanding, and assimilating and reaching to the limit of his existence attains the location of Brahman. He is never born again. He is indeed never born again.'

22 ekam eva samam tattvaṁ vadanti hi vipaścitaḥ rāga-tyāgāt punaḥ cittaṁ ekānekaṁ na vidyate.

'Men of wisdom indeed say that equipoise is the reality underlying all. If attachment is removed there occurs no mind with its manifold expressions.'

Mundaka (3 2 7): gatāḥ kalāḥ pancadaśa pratiṣṭhāḥ devās ca sarve prati-devatāsu karmāṇi vijnānamayaś ca ātmā parevyaye sarva ekibhavanti.

'The fifteen aspects of the (physical body) disappear in their bases. All Gods disappear in the respective Gods who form their origin. Even all actions and self of the nature of consciousness—all these become one when they are in the highest truth, the inexhaustible.'

Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka (1 6.1.3): sarvaiḥ nāmabhiḥ samam . . . sarvaiḥ rūpaiḥ samam sarvaiḥ karmabhiḥ samam.

'It is the same to all names. . . It is the same to all forms. . . . It is the same to all actions . . . that is, it is equipoise in every sense.'

Chāndogya (2.1.1): samastasya khalu sāmā upāsanagm sādhu yat khalu sādhu tat samety ācaksate yadasādhu tadasameti.

'To him there is sama, equipoise. What he studies, reflects and meditates is equipoise, that is, Veda. They say that which is good is equipoise and that which is not good, asama, the negation of equipoise.'

23. anātma-rūpaṁ ca kathaṁ samādhiḥ ātma-svarūpaṁ ca kathaṁ samādhiḥ astīti nāstīti kathaṁ samādhiḥ mokṣa-svarūpaṁ yadi sarvaṁ ekaṁ.

'How can that which is non-self be the source of peace, how can that which is the (individual) Self be the source of peace, how can the theory 'is' or 'is not' be the source of peace, if the truth is all-identity, that is, equipoise and it is the very disposition of liberation?'

Kaṭha (1.1.26): śvo bhāvā martyasya yadantakaitat sarvendriyānām jarayanti tejaḥ. api sarvaṁ jīvitam alpaṁ eva. Na vittaena tarpanyō manuṣyah. . . . abhidhyāyan varṇa-rati-pramodān ati dīrgha jīvite ko rameta. yasmin idaṁ vicikitsanti mṛtyo yat sāmparāye mahati brūhi naś tat.

'All those that belong to man's existence, O the Destroyer, come to an end tomorrow. The power of all senses becomes exhausted. All life lived is nothing. Man is incapable of being satisfied by wealth. . . . Contemplating on birth, happiness and joy, if one lives long how can one be happy? Tell me that Truth, O God of Death! which leads us on to the highest liberation.'

Kaṭha (1.1.20): yeyam prete vicikitsā manuṣye astīty eke nāyam astīti caike. etad vidyām anuśiṣṭas tvayāham.

'If one is dead there is the doubt in man—Some say that one continues to exist and some that one does not. This is (the second point) with regard to which I am to be instructed by you.'

Kaṭha (1.1.17): brahmajñaṁ devamīdyaṁ viditvā nicāyyemām śantiṁ atyantam eti.

'Having understood Brahman which is to be attained through Veda and which is the knower in all and reflected on this shining one, the goal of all praise and having meditated on this truth one attains to liberation which is no other than absolute peace.'

24. viśuddhosi samaṁ tattvaṁ videhas tvaṁ ajovyayaḥ jānāmīha najānāmīty ātmānaṁ manyase kathaṁ.

'Pure you are. Reality is equipoise. You have no body. You are unborn and imperishable. How then can you hold that you know the Self or do not know the Self?'

Kena (2 3.11): yasyāmatam tasya matam matam yasya na veda saḥ avijñātām vijñātām vijnātām avijñātām tad eva brahma tvam viddhi nedaṁ yad idam upāsate.

'One who knows it knows it. One who knows it does not understand it. To those who claim to know it, it is not known and to those who seem not to know it it is known. Know that to be Brahman. It is not this (which is commonly presented).

25. tattvamyasyādi vākyena svātmā hi pratipāditāḥ neti neti śrutir brūyāt anrtam pānca-bhautikam

'By means of the scriptural statements such as "That thou art" the truth of the Self is expounded. The Śruti "neither this nor that" proves that all that is of the five-fold elements is unreal.'

Chāndogya (6.15.13) tattvam asi.

'That thou art.'

Bṛhad-Āranyaka (2 1 20): neti neti. asmād ātmanah. . sarvāṇi bhūtāni vyuccaranti. tasyopanīsat satyasya satyam iti. prānā vai satyam. teṣāṁ eṣa satyam.

'It is not this, nor that.' 'From this Self. . . all elements, all creatures are thrown out. In this regard the Upaniṣad, that is, the Upaniṣadic conclusion is "The real of the real". Vital principles are real. Of them it (the Self) is real, that is, It is the highest reality '

26. ātmany evātmanā sarvam tvayā pūrnam nīrantaram dhyātā dhyānam na te cittam nīrajjah dhyāyate katham.

'In the Self by the Self which is yourself all is pervaded without giving room for duality. The thought of meditator and meditation is irrelevant to your mind. How can that which is never an exception, unashamedly be meditated on?'

Chāndogya-Upaniṣad (7.15.2): athāta ātmādeśa eva ātmaiva adhastāt ātmopariṣṭhāt ātmā paścāt ātmā purastāt ātmā dakṣīnataḥ ātmā uttarataḥ ātmaivedaṁ sarvam.

'Further therefore the exposition of Self (follows). Self alone is what is below. Self alone is what is above. Self alone is what is behind.
Self alone is what is in front. Self alone is what is on the right side. Self alone is what is on the left side. Self alone is indeed all this '

Chāndogya (7.16.1): ātmato vijnānam ātmato dhyānam ātmataścittam.

'From Self knowledge. From Self meditation. From Self mind.'

The idea is that excepting Self there is nothing. But Self can never be excepted.

27. śivam na jñāmi katham vadāmi śivam na jñāmi katham bhajāmi aham śivaś cet paramārtha-tattvam sama-svarūpam gaganopamam ca.

'I do not know the auspicious. How can I expound it? I do not know the auspicious. How can I worship it? I am myself the auspicious, the highest Reality. I am of the essence of equipoise even as space.' Chāndogya (4.10.5): prāṇo brahma kam brahma kham brahmeti. . . . yad vāva kam tad eva kham yad eva kham tadeva kam iti. prāṇam cāhāsmāi tadākāśam cocuḥ.

'The vital principle (in me) is Brahman. Auspiciousness is Brahman. Space is Brahman. This is the Truth. . . . That which is auspicious indeed that alone is space. That which alone is space is indeed auspicious. For this reason, for the same indeed, that is, the same, they say, the vital principle as well as space.'

Chāndogya (4.11.1-2): ya eṣa āditye puruṣo drśyate soham asmi sa evāham asmīti. sa ya etaṁ evaṁ vidvān upāste apahate pāpakṛtyām lokī bhavati sarvaṁ āyur eti jyogjīvati nāsyāvara-puruṣāḥ kṣīyante. 'That this Self which is seen in the sun, He I am: He alone I am. This is the Truth. One who knows this Truth thus and meditates having his evil deeds destroyed becomes one of position, obtains full life, leads the life of illumination and his descendents never perish.'

28. nāham tattvam samam tattvam kalpanā-hetu-varjitam grāhya-grāhaka-nirmuktaṁ svasamvedyam katham bhavet.

'I (individual) am not reality. Equipoise is Reality. It is devoid of the basis of superimposition. The distinction of being apprehended and being an apprehender is irrelevant to it. How can it be the object of itself?'

Kaṭha (2.4.10): yad eveha tad amutra yad amutra tad anviha mṛtyos sa mṛtyuṁ āpnoti ya iha nāneva paśyati. manasaivedamāptavyam neha nānāsti kiṁ ca na.

'That alone which is here is that which is there. That which is there is just that which is here. One who sees distinction in this all-absorbing reality meets with destruction. It ought to be attained by insight. There is no duality in this reality.' The thought of meditator, meditation etc., are in the usual sense the expressions of duality.

29 ananta-rūpaṁ na hi vastu kiṁ cit tattva-svarūpaṁ na hi vastu kiṁ cit

atmaika-rūpaṁ paramārtha-tattvaṁ na hiṁsako vāpi nacāpy ahiṁsā.

'The Reality is of infinite forms, but it is no entity. It is of the essence of Truth itself, but it is no entity. It is only of the form of Self. It is absolute Reality. There is neither one that causes injury to it, nor is there any injury caused with reference to it, nor is non-injury attributed to it.'

Katha (1.2.14): anyatra dharmāt anyatrādharmāt anyatrāsmāt kṛtakṛtāt. anyatra bhūtāc ca havyāc ca yat tat paśyasi tad vada. . . . etaddhy evāksaram brahmā etaddhy evākṣaram param. . . . mahāntaṁ vibhum ātmānam matvā dhīro na śocati . . . hantā cet manyate hantum hantaś cet manyate hataṁ ubhau tau na vijānīto nāyam hanti na hanyate.

'Attributes are irrelevant to it (Truth). Non-attributes are irrelevant to it. This thing that is done and the thing that is not done are irrelevant to it. The past, the future are irrelevant to it. Tell me that Truth which you have realised. . . . That alone is imperishable. That is Brahman. This alone is imperishable. It is the highest. It is the greatest. It is all pervading. It is Self. . . . Having understood it one becomes the man of wisdom. To this one misery does not occur. . . . He who thinks that he kills it or that he is capable of killing it, he who thinks that it is killed and that it can be killed, both of them are deluded. It (the Truth) is neither the killer nor is it killed.'

The idea is that attributes are as a rule relative and the Absolute therefore transcends all attributes.

30 viśuddhosi samaṁ tattvaṁ videhaṁ ajaṁ avyayam vibhramam katham ātmārthe vibhrāntohaṁ katham punah.

'Pure you are. Equipose is Reality. It has no body. It has no birth. It does not perish. How can there be illusion with reference to Self? How indeed can I be deluded?'

Katha (1.2.22): aśarīram śarīreṣu anavasthesv avasthitam.

'In the bodies it is bodiless. It is enduring in those that do not endure.'

Katha (2.4.2): atha dhīrāḥ amṛtatvam veditvā dhruvam adhruvesu iha na prārthayante.

'Further those that have wisdom having understood that all enduring immortality underlies transient realities are never after things that fall short of it.'

Praśna (4.10): param evākṣaram pratipadyate sa yo ha vai tad acchāyam aśarīram alohitam śubhram akṣaram vedayate yas tu somya sa sarvajñaḥ sarvo bhavati.

'He indeed attains to the most imperishable. The same person who understands the shadowless, bodiless, colourless, pure and the inexhaustible, he, O Dear! becomes indeed all-knowing and becomes all.'

31. ghaṭe bhinne ghaṭākāśam sulīnam bheda-varjitaṁ śivena manasā śuddho na bhedaḥ pratibhāti me.

'If a jar is broken the space contained in it merges (in the larger space). It is then devoid of the distinction from the larger one. I am pure by means of a mind auspicious in character. There appears no distinction to me.'

Kaṭha (2.2.5). ya yeṣu supteṣu jāgarti kāmam kāmam puruṣaṁ nirmamāṇaḥ. tad eva śukram tad brahma tad evāmṛtam ucyate tasmin lokāḥ śritāḥ sarvā tad u nātyeti kaś cana. . . . etad vai tat agnir yathaikaḥ. . . . vāyur yathaikaḥ. . . . sūryo yathā sarva lokasya cakṣuḥ. . . . ekas tathā sarva-bhūtāntarātmā na lipyate loka duḥkhena bāhyaḥ manasai-vedam āptavyam neha nānāsti kiṁ ca na
'In the persons who are asleep that person who is awake creating (things) according to His wish is He that is pure. It is He that is Brahman. It is He alone that is said to be immortal. In Him all worlds are located. Nothing goes beyond Him. . . . Is this not that (which you want to know?) . . . Just as air which is one. . . . just as the sun which is the eye of the whole world. . . . This one person is similarly the Self in all creatures. He is not tainted by the misery of the world. He is transcendent. He is attained to only by means of knowledge. There is no distinction within Himself.'

32. na ghaṭo na ghaṭākāśo na jīvo jīva-vigrahaḥ kevalam brahma samviddhi vedya-vedaka-varjitaṁ.

'There is neither a jar, nor the space contained in the jar, nor an individual self, nor the body of an individual self. Understand that all that is, is nothing but Brahman. It is devoid of subjective and objective aspects.'

Kaṭha (2.3.10): yadā pancāvatiṣṭhante jñānāni manasā saha buddhiś ca na viceṣṭati tām āhuḥ paramām gatiṁ. eko vaśī sarva-bhūtāntarātmā ekaṁ rūpaṁ bahudhā yaḥ karoti. . . . tam ātmasthaṁ yenu paśyanti dhīrāḥ teṣāṁ sukhaṁ śāśvataṁ netareṣāṁ.

'When the five kinds of knowledge (caused by the five sensory organs) become quiescent and with mind intellect as such ceases to operate, that is the highest state they say. One, which controls all, which is the inner principle of all creatures, which is in itself one but which is the author of multiplicity, and which . . . those that see as residing within (individual) self are those whose happiness is enduring, but not the happiness of others.'

The last statement of Śruti forms an earlier passage of the same Śruti

33 sarvatra sarvadā sarvam ātmānam satatam dhruvam sarvam śūnyam aśūnyam ca tan mām viddhi na saṁśayah.

'Everywhere, always, in all know the Ātman to be the enduring or the abiding. Know me as all, void and the non-void. There is no doubt about this'

Kātha (2.5.8). tasmīn lokāḥ śritāḥ sarva . . . yad idam kim ca jagat sarvam.

'In it are sustained all the worlds, and whatever exists in the world.'

Taittirīya (2-7): asad vā idam agra āsīt tato vai sad ajāyata.

'Non-being was there in the beginning and from that originated being.'

Chāndogya (6.2 1). sad eva somyedaṁ agra āsīt.

'O Somya! Only Being was there in the beginning'

Āitareya (1.1): ātmā vā idam agra āsīt nā-nyat kim ca na miṣat.

'Ātman alone existed prior to all things Nothing else existed then.'

34. vedāḥ na lokāḥ na surā na yajñah varṇāśramo naiva kulam na jātiḥ na dhūma-mārgo na ca dipti-mārgo brahmaika-rūpam paramārtha-tattvam.

'There is neither scripture, nor worlds, nor Gods nor sacrifices, no classes nor stages of life, neither race nor caste, neither the way of smoke nor the path of flame. Ultimate Reality which is Brahman is alone manifest. It is the Highest Reality.'

Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka (6.2.15.15): te ya evaṁ etad vīdūḥ . . . te arcirabhi sambhavanti . . . tān . . . puruṣo . . . brahma-lokān gamayati. teṣu brahma-lokeṣu parāḥ parāvato vasantī teṣāṁ na punar āvartih . . . atha ye yajñena dānena tapasā lokān jayanti te dhūmaṁ abhisambhavanti . . . te evaṁ evānuparivartante.

'Those that know this truth . . . they go to the world of illumination . . . Them . . . the spirit . . . takes to the world of Brahman. In the worlds of Brahman they live endlessly. For them there is no coming back. . . . Further those by means of sacrifice, charity, austerity realise locations go to the world of smoke. . . . They in the same way rotate.'

Chāndogya (5.10.1): tad ye ittham viduḥ . . . te arcīṣaṁ abhi saṁbhavanti . . . sa enān brahma gamayati eṣa devayānaḥ panthā iti . . . atha ya ime grāma iṣṭāpūrte dattaṁ ity upāsate te dhūmaṁ abhi saṁbhavanti . . . tad ya iha ramaṇīya-caraṇāḥ ramaṇīyāṁ yonim āpadyeran . . . kapūya-caraṇāḥ . . . kapūyāṁ yonim āpadyeran . . . athaitayoḥ pathoḥ na kātareṇa ca na tānīmāni kṣudrāṇi asakṛd āvartini bhūtāni bhavanti jāyasva mriyasveti etat tṛtīyaṁ sthānaṁ. . . .

'Those that know this . . . go to the world of illumination. He (the Spirit) takes them to Brahman. This is the path of Gods. . . . Further, those who believe in sacrifice, charity and in that which is given in charity go to the world of smoke. . . . Those of good actions are born in good circumstances. . . . Those of evil actions are born in evil circumstances. . . . Further of these two paths if neither is followed they become low born creatures having repeated birth and death. They come into being and go out of it. This is the third position.'

Chāndogya (5-10-10):

atha ha ya evaṁ pancāgnīn veda na sa ha tair apy ācaran pāpmanā lipyate śuddhaḥ pūtaḥ puṇya-loko bhavati.

'Further (of) those who know these five fires (expounding the truth of Brahman) in this manner, even though by them acts are done, even a single individual is not tainted by sin. He is pure, holy and auspicious.'

Vedas as dealing with worlds, Gods, sacrifice, varṇa, āśrama and the different paths—smoke and fire are inferior, aparāḥ. All these are transcended by a man of wisdom. They are therefore not real. Brahman alone is real. There is nothing against Brahman.

Therefore Muṇḍaka (1.1.5) says: tat rāparā ṛgvedo yajurvedaḥ.

'Of the two sciences, superior and inferior, the inferior one's are ṛg-veda, yajur-veda and so on.'

35. vyāpya-vyāpaka-nirmuktaṁ tvam ekaḥ saphalaṁ yadi pratyakṣaṁ cāparokṣaṁ ca ātmānam manyase katham.

'If one is successful in attaining you who is devoid of the distinction of the pervaded and the pervading, how can you know the Self to be itself or the other?'

Kena (2.19) says: yadī manyase suvedeti dabhram evāpi nūnam tvam vettha brahmano rūpam.

'If you hold that you have clear knowledge (of Brahman) indeed you understand Brahman very little, that is, you have indeed made Brahman, incomplete, dabhra.'

36. advaitam kecid icchanti dvaitam icchanti cāpare samam tattvam na vindanti dvaitādvaita-vivarjitam.

'Some select non-duality. Others select duality. They do not understand the Truth which is the state of equipoise, being neither duality nor non-duality.'

To insist on either duality or non-duality is irrelevant to Truth. Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka (1.4.2.3) having observed—dvitīyād vai bhayam bhavati.

'The second causes fear, that is, duality is the source of fear',—notes further. tasmād ekākī na ramate sa dvitīyam aiçchat.

'Therefore that which is single does not feel happy. It desired the second.'

The meaning of ekākī and dvitīya must be carefully understood. Ekākī is taken to mean singleness without authorship. It is evil. Advaita is evil in this sense. Dvitīya is taken to mean something that is independent of Brahman. It is therefore an evil. It does not bring out the character of peace in Brahman. Dvaita is evil in this sense. But the Truth is sama, equipoise. Call it advaita. But advaita does not mean singleness without authorship. Call it dvaita. But dvaita does not mean dualism. It rather signifies the richness of the Truth. In recognition of all these ideas the Truth is, after Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka characterised as sama, equipoise. In this concept the opposition of dvaita and advaita is annulled.

37. śvetādi-varna-rahitam śabdādi-guṇa-varjitam kathayanti katham tattvam manovācām agocaram.

'Reality is devoid of colours (white, etc) and it is devoid of the qualities sound, etc. How can they (those that think wrongly) expound it which is beyond mind and speech?'

Kaṭha (1.3 15): aśabdam asparśam arūpam avyayam tathārasam nityam agandhavad ca yat.

'That which is ever devoid of sound, touch, colour, diminution and similarly taste and odour.'

38. yadānṛtaṁ idaṁ sarvaṁ dehādi gaganopamaṁ tadā hi brahma samvetti na te dvaita-paramparā.

'If all this consisting of body and so on is unreal, that is, if one recognises all this is unreal, then alone one understands Brahman that is similar to space. (If you attain the state then) there occurs no continuity of duality.'

Praśna (2.15): teṣāṁ evaiṣa brahma-loko yeṣāṁ tapo brahmacyaṁ yeṣu satyaṁ pratiṣṭhitaṁ. teṣāṁ asau virajo Brahma-loko na yeṣu jimham anṛtaṁ na māyā ceti.

'For those, this alone is the location of Brahman, those in whom there is austerity as well as celibacy, that is, devotion only to Brahman, and those in whom truthfulness, that is, Brahman, being the end of all speech is well established. For those this is the faultless location of Brahman, those in whom there is neither crookedness nor falsehood, nor deceit.'

39. pareṇa sahajātmāpi hyabhinnaḥ pratibhāti me vyomākāraṁ tathaivaikaṁ dhyātā dhyānaṁ kathaṁ bhavet.

'Even though Self appears rightly to belong to some other being also, to me it appears to be indeed an identity. It is space-like. It is likewise one. How can there be a meditator and meditation with reference to it?'

Chāndogya (4.11.1): yoyaṁ antar hṛdaya ākāśaḥ tad etat pūrṇaṁ. 'That this which is expounded so far dwells in the heart (of a person). It is absolute illumination. That which is this is complete.'

Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka (1.4.10): atha yonyāṁ devatām-upāsate asau anyohaṁ asmīti na sa veda.

'Further, he who meditates on a different God with the conviction "He is different from me and I am different from Him" does not know Truth.'

40. yat karomi yad aśnāmi yaj juhomi dadāmi yat etat sarvaṁ na me kiṁ cit viśuddhohaṁ ajovyayaḥ.

'What I do, what I eat, what I sacrifice and what I give away, nothing of them belongs to me. Pure I am. I am unborn and imperishable.'

Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka (1.4.15-16): yadi ha vā apy anevaṁ-vid mahat puṇyaṁ karma karoti tad hāsyāntataḥ kṣiyata eva. ātmānaṁ eva lokam upāsita. sa ya ātmānam eva lokam upāsate na hāsyā karma kṣīyate. asmād hi evātmano yadyat kāmāyate tat tat sṛjate. 'If indeed a person who does not know the Truth thus (in the manner explained in the Upaniṣad) does a highly meritorious deed, it indeed melts away within himself. One ought to see that Self is the location (of all deeds). He who sees Self as the location (origin) (of all deeds) is he whose activity, that is, the deed found in him does not come to an end. (All deeds are) indeed from this Self. Whichever It desires It creates it.'

In conclusion it is said: ayam vā ātmā sarvesām bhūtānām lokah. 'This Self is indeed the basis, the origin of all creatures.'

41. sarvam jagad viddhi nirākṛtīdam sarvam jagad viddhi vikāra-hīnam sarvam jagad viddhi viśuddha-deham sarvam jagad viddhi śivaikarūpam.

'You understand that all that is (really) the world is formless. You understand that all that is the world is changeless. You understand that all that is the world is pure in its content. Understand that all that is the world is nothing but auspicious'

Chāndogya (6.16.3): sarvam khalv idaṁ brahma.

'All this is Brahman.'

Taittirīya (3 6): ānando brahmeti vyajānāt.

'One ought to know that Brahman is Bliss'

42. tattvam tvam na hi sandhah kim jānāmy athavā punah asamvedyam svasamvedyam ātmānam manyase katham

'Reality you are. There is no doubt. Is there anything that I can understand? That which cannot be known and that which is self-evident is Self. How can you understand It?

Chāndogya (6): sa ātmā tattvam asi.

'That is Ātman. That thou art.'

Kaṭha (2.5.14): katham nu tad vijānīyam.

'How can I understand It?'

43. māyā māyā katham tāta chāya chāyā navidyate tattvam ekaṁ idaṁ sarvam vyomākāram niranjanam.

'How is nescience, nescience? O Dear! Shadow is not shadow (unreal). Reality is one. It is all this. It is all-pervading. It is space-like. It is defectless.'

Kaṭha (2.5.9): rūpaṁ rūpaṁ pratirūpo babhūva.

‘Corresponding to each form of it there appeared another form.’

Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka (2.5.19): indro māyābhiḥ puru-rūpa iyate.

‘Indra by means of his powers assumed many forms.’

So what other thinkers consider to be nescience or shadow is real even as nescience or shadow. Upaniṣads may call it māyā or anṛta. But it must not be taken to mean unreality. It rather illustrates the rich and complete character of the divine power.

44. ādi-madhyānta-muktohaṁ na baddho haṁ kadācana
svabhāva-nirmalaś śuddhaḥ iti me niścītā matiḥ.

‘I am devoid of beginning, middle and end. I am never bound. I am defectless by nature. I am pure. This is my realisation with conviction.’

Chāndogya (8.1.5): eṣa ātmā apahata-pāpmā vijaro vimṛtyuḥ viśoko avijighatso apipāsaḥ.

‘This Self is untouched by sins, free from decay, free from death, free from misery, not in need of food and is devoid of thirst.’

Kaṭha (1.2.18): ajo nityaḥ śāśvatoyaṁ.

‘This has no beginning and no end.’

45. mahad-ādi jagat sarvaṁ na kiṁ cit pratibhāti me
brahmaiva kevalaṁ sarvaṁ kathaṁ varṇāśrama-sthitiḥ.

‘Nothing of the world supposed to consist of mahat and so on appears to me. Brahman, nothing but Brahman is all. How can there be the existence of caste and creed?’

Chāndogya (7.24.1): yatra nānyat paśyati: nānyat śṛṇoti: nānyad vijānāti: sa bhūmā. atha yatra anyat paśyati: anyat śṛṇoti: anyad vijānāti: tad alpaṁ yo vai bhūmā tad amṛtaṁ. atha yad alpaṁ tan martyaṁ. sa bhagavaḥ kasmin pratiṣṭhita iti sve mahimni yad vā na mahimnīti.

‘That state in which one sees nothing else, hears nothing else, knows nothing else, is the complete. Further that state in which one sees something else, hears something else, knows something else, is incomplete. That which is complete is immortal. Further that which is incomplete is mortal. O Revered! On what is it based? On its own greatness or on no (other) greatness, that is, on itself.’

Kaṭha (1.3.15): mahataḥ paraṁ dhruvaṁ.

‘It is beyond mahat, that is, It is the source of mahat. It is stable.’

Brhad-Āraṇyaka (1 4.11): brahma vā idaṁ agra āsīt ekaṁ eva.

'Prior to the creation of this world Brahman alone existed. It was one alone.'

46. jñāmi sarvathā sarvaṁ eko nirantaram nirālambam aśūnyaṁ ca śūnyaṁ vyomādi-pancakam.

'I understand all in all aspects. I am one. I am distinctless. I am in need of no support. I am non-void, void and the five-fold elements, space and so on.'

Brhad-Āraṇyaka (2.1.20): asmād ātmanaḥ sarve prānāḥ sarve lokāḥ sarve devāḥ sarvāṇi bhūtāni vyuccaranti tasyopaniṣad satyasya satyam iti.

'From this Self, all vital principles, all worlds, all gods, all elements emanate. With reference to this Truth is the Upaniṣadic conclusion "It is the Real of the Real".'

47. na śaṇḍo na pumān na strī na bodho naiva kalpanā sānando vā nirānandaṁ ātmānaṁ manyase katham

'It is not neutral. It is not man. It is not woman. It is not mind Nor is it an imagination It has no peace, but it is not devoid of peace. How then can you understand Self?'

Katha (2 5.14): tad etad iti manyante anirdeśyaṁ paramaṁ sukhaṁ. katham nu tad vijānīyāṁ kimubhāti na bhāti vā.

'They (the seers) know that it is this indefinable one and is of the nature of highest bliss. How can I understand it? It shines; but at the same time it does not shine.'

Katha (2.5.11): ekas tathā sarva-bhūtāntarātmā nalipyate loka-duhkkena bāhyah.

'This one is likewise the underlying Self of all creatures. It is not tainted by the misery of the world. It is transcendent.'

The idea is that even the so called bliss, ānanda is related and it falls short of the truth. It does not therefore characterise Brahman.

48. śaḍaṅga yogān na tu naiva śuddham mano-vināśān na tu naiva śuddham gurūpadeśān na tu naiva śuddham svayaṁ ca tattvaṁ svayaṁ eva buddham.

'That which is pure is not attained to by means of the discipline of yoga with its six limbs. It is not attained to by the destruction of mind. Nor is it attained to by the instruction of a preceptor. Verily it is self-established. It shines by itself.'

Muṇḍaka (2.2.7): tad vijñānena paripaśyanti dhīrāḥ ānanda-rūpaṁ amṛtaṁ yad vibhāti.

'This truth, by means of knowledge, the men of wisdom see—the truth which is peace itself, which is immortal and which shines of its own accord.'

Muṇḍaka (3.3.6): nāyaṁ ātmā pravacanena labhyaḥ na medhayā na bahunā śrutena. yaṁ evaiṣa vṛṇute tena labhyaḥ tasyaiṣa ātmā vivṛṇute tanūṁ svam. nāyaṁ ātmā balahīnena labhyaḥ na ca pramādāt tapasā vāpy alingāt. etair upāyaiḥ vartate yas tu vidvān tasyaiṣa ātmā viśate brahma-dhāma. . . . vedānta-vijñāna-uniścitārthāḥ sanyāsa-yogād yatayaḥ śuddha-satvāḥ. te brahma-lokeṣu parānta-kāle parāmṛtāḥ parimucyanti sarve.

'This Self is not attained by discourse nor by intellect, nor by much of learning. It is attained only by him whom It elects. To him this Self reveals Its person. This Self is not attained by a weak person, nor by chance or by illusion, nor by austerity, nor by not following any religion. Only in the case of the man of wisdom who makes efforts by these means (expounded so far in the Upaniṣad) this Self enters into the location of Brahman. So that this Self, that is Brahman becomes revealed to that man. Those to whom the meaning of Veda has become definite by means of the knowledge obtained by Vedānta, those who have brought themselves under control by means of detachment and those whose being is pure, become immortal, without limitation in the location of the Brahman and they are all completely liberated.'

Kaṭha (2.6.9): na sandṛśe tiṣṭhati rūpaṁ asya na cakṣuṣā paśyati kaścanainaṁ. hṛdā maṇiṣi manasābhiklipto ya etadvidur amṛtās te bhavanti. yadā pancāvatiṣṭhante jñānāni manasā saha. buddhiś ca na viceṣṭati tām āhuḥ paramām gatiṁ. tām yogaṁ iti manyante sthirām indriya-dhāraṇām. apramattas tadā bhavati yogo hi prabhavāpyayau. naiva vācā na manasā prāptuṁ śakyo na cakṣuṣā. astīti bruvatonyatra katham tad upalabhyate. astītyevopalabdavyaḥ tattva-bhāvena cobhayoḥ. astītyevopalabdhasya tattva-bhāvaḥ prasīdati. yadā sarve pramucyante kāmā yesya hṛdi sthitāḥ. atha martyo amṛto bhavati atra brahma samaśnute.

'The form of this truth does not occupy a place in a clear light. No body sees it by means of the eyes. By the inner vision purified by reflection those who realise it become immortal. When the five aspects of knowledge produced by the five organs along with mind stand effectless and the principle of intellect (that causes distraction) does not operate, that, they say, is the highest state. They understand that to be the discipline of yoga which is the same as the steady control of organs. Then he (the aspirant) becomes free from delusion. Yoga is thus the origin (of the coming good) and destruction (of the past). It (the Truth) is capable of being attained to neither by speech nor by mind, nor by eyes. How can it be understood by one who holds that It is outside one's self. It must be recognised to be existent in both (the man of wisdom and the man of illusion) by means of insight into Truth. To one who recognises it to be existent (in this manner) there occurs insight into Truth. When (for the same reason) all the desires that exist in mind become removed, then afterwards the man becomes immortal. He attains to Brahman here in the present life alone '

Katha (1.3 12): yesa sarvesu bhūtesu gūḍhotmā na prakāśate dṛśyatetv agryayā buddhyā sūkṣmayā sūkṣma-darśibhiḥ anādy anantaṁ mahataḥ param dhruvam nicāyya tam mṛtyu-mukhāt pramucyate.

'In all these elements or creatures Self is hidden and it is not apparent. It is realised by means of the best intellect, sharp and subtle by those that are capable of perceiving the subtlest. It is beginningless and endless, higher than mahat, transcendent and stable. One who has understood it by means of enquiry becomes liberated from the mouth of death '

49 na hi pancātmako bhedo videho vartate na hi ātmaiva kevalam sarvaṁ turīyam ca trayam katham

'The body consisting of five elements is not real. There does not exist that which has no body. Pure Self and nothing else is all. It is transcendent. How can the other three states exist?'

Māṇḍūkya (1): aum ity etad akṣaram idam sarvaṁ tasyo-pavyākhyānam bhūtaṁ bhavat bhaviṣyad iti sarvaṁ omkāra eva. yac cānyat trikālātītam tad apy aumkāra eva. . . sarvaṁ hy etad brahma.

'This imperishable Truth is signified as aum, that is as expounded by the whole Veda. It is all this. To restate it in detail—the past, present and future, all this is nothing but aum, that is, this truth. If there is anything else that transcends these three aspects of time, that also is nothing but aum, that is, the same truth. . . . All this is indeed Brahman '

50. na baddho naiva muktoham na cāham brahmaṇaḥ prthak na kartā na ca bhoktāham vyāpya-vyāpaka-varjitaḥ.

'I am not bound. Nor am I liberated. I am not myself. I am not other than Brahman. I am not a doer. I am not an enjoyer. I am devoid of the distinction of being included and being inclusive.'

Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka (3.9.27): sa eṣa neti nety ātmā agrhyo na hi grhyate aśīryo na hi śīryate asango na hi sajjate asito na vyathate na riṣyati.

'That this self is neither this nor that. It is not apprehended. It cannot indeed be grasped. It is undivided. It cannot indeed be cut into parts. It is unrelated. It is not indeed subject to relation. It is never bound. It cannot indeed be made painful. It does not undergo destruction.'

Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka (2.3.16): asaṅgo hy ayaṁ puruṣaḥ.

'This spiritual principle (so far expounded in the Upaniṣad) is devoid of relation.'

51. yathā jalam jale nyastam salilam bheda-varjitam prakṛtiṁ puruṣam tadvad abhinnaṁ pratibhāti me.

'Even as water being mixed with water is devoid of distinction, (I see) matter and spirit are devoid of distinction. This is what comes to my mind.'

Kaṭha (2.4.14): yathodakam śuddhe suddham āsiktam tādṛg eva bhavati

evam muner vijānata ātmā bhavati gautama.

'Even as pure water which is added on to pure water becomes similar to the latter, similarly, O Gautama! Self becomes the same in the case of the sage who has attained wisdom.'

In this verse the word abhinna is used in the sense of the Upaniṣadic tādṛk.

52. yadi nāma na muktoṣi na baddhoṣi kadācana sākāram ca nirākāram ātmānam manyase katham?

'Supposing you are not liberated, you are never bound. How then can you understand Self which is of form and no form?'

Kaṭha (2.5.1): vimuktaś ca vimucyate.

'He who is already liberated is liberated.'

53. jānāmi te param rūpaṁ pratyakṣam gaganopamam yathā param hi rūpaṁ yan marīci-jala-sannibham.

'I understand that your real essence is immediately presented. It is space-like. That which appears to be other than this is indeed like the water of a mirage.'

Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka (4.4.12): ātmānam cet vijānīyat ayaṁ asmīti pūrusah

kiṁ icchan kasya kāmāya śarīraṁ anusancaret.

'If one realises Self as 'I am. Therefore I am the Spirit', then desiring what and for what satisfaction one ought to follow body.'

The idea is this: In the case of this one there is no necessity to desire anything or to hanker after any satisfaction. For this reason he has not to follow bodily conditions.

54. na guruh nopadeśaś ca na copādhir na me kriyā videhaṁ gaganam viddhi viśuddhoham svabhāvatah

'There is no teacher. There is no teaching. There is nothing to condition. There is no duty for me. Understand me to be bodiless space itself I am by nature pure.'

Chāndogya (7.3 2): atha yad idaṁ brahma-pure punḍarikam veśma dahiāresmin antare ākāśah tasmin yad antah tad anveṣṭavyam tad vā va vijñāsitavyam iti. . . . esa ātmā apahata-pāpmā vijaro vimṛtyuh.

'Further in the location of Brahman in this lotus abode, in this subtle place there is within a point of space. That which lies within it ought to be sought for. It indeed ought to be reflected on. . . . This is Self. All sins are destroyed in it. It is free from change. It is free from death, that is, change and death do not exist there.'

55. viśuddhosya śarīro si na te cittam parāt param
aham cātmā param tattvam iti vaktum na lajjase.

'You are the pure body of this reality. Your mind is not yours It is higher than the highest. Do not hesitate to say, "I am the highest Self, I am the supreme reality".'

Chāndogya (1.9 1). ākāśo ha vai jyāyān ākāśah parāyanam.

'Verily the absolute illumination is indeed the highest. The absolute illumination is the final goal.'

The word ākāśa means absolute illumination. This is a compound of ā and kāśa. Ā means samantāt, absolute. The root kāś means illumination, kāśr dīptāu.

Chāndogya (8 3.2-4): atha yecāsyā iha jivāh. . . . anrtāpīdhānāh . . . hiraṇya-nidhīm nihitam aksetrajnāh upary upari sancarantah na vindeyuh evam eva imāh sarvāh prajāh ahar ahar gacchantyah etaṁ brahma-lokaṁ na vindanti. anrtena hi pratyūdhāh sa vā esa ātmā hrđi. . . . atha ya eṣa samprasādo asmāt śarīrāt samutthā paramjyotir upasanipadya svena rūpeṇa abhiniṣpadyate eṣa ātmeti hovāca. etad amṛtaṁ etat brahmeti.

'Further what jīvas are there here . . . obscured in falsehood. . . . Those that do not know the disposition of the place though they tread over and over again that place in which there is the treasure of gold hidden and yet do not understand (that there is the treasure). Similarly all these creatures though they go every day to this abode of Brahman do not understand (what they do). They are obscured in falsehood. That this Self is within the heart (of the aspirant). Further the following is what is called divine grace, that the aspirant having gone out of this body and having attained to the highest illumination obtains his real essence. He (the seer) said that this is Self. It is immortal. It is fearless. It is Brahman.'

56. katham rodiṣi re citta hy atmaivātmātmanā bhava piba vatsa kalātītaṁ advaitaṁ paramāmṛtaṁ.

'O Mind! Why do you weep? Be Self itself by means of Self. Drink O Dear! the nectar, the best of its kind which is of the nature of equipoise, transcending all distinctions.'

Chāndogya (3.18.1): mano brahmety upāsita.

'Mind ought to be meditated on as Brahman.'

Maṇḍūkya (12): evaṁ aumkāraḥ ātmaiva samviśati ātmanātmānaṁ.

'Thus Self is expounded by the whole Veda. (One who knows this truth) becomes Self by means of Self.'

Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka (4.3.32): eko draṣṭā advaito bhavati eṣa brahma-lokaḥ.

'It is the one seer. It is identity, that is, equipoise. This the abode of Brahman.'

57. naiva bodho na cābodho na bodhābodha eva ca yasyedṛsaḥ sadā bodhaḥ sa bodho nānyathā bhavet.

'There is neither knowledge, nor non-knowledge nor half-knowledge. If to some one this knowledge occurs without break, that is knowledge. It is never defied, that is, it is never fruitless.'

Māṇḍūkya (7): nāntaḥ prajnaṁ na bahiḥ prajnaṁ nobhayataḥ prajnaṁ . . . aikātmya-pratyaya-sāraṁ.

'It is neither the consciousness grasping the entities inside the body the consciousness grasping the external things, nor the consciousness having both the capacities. . . . It is of the essence of consciousness. It is the highest. It is Self complete.'

58. jñānam na tarko na samādhi yogo na deśa-kālau na gurūpadeśah svabhāva-samvittir aham ca tattvam ākāśa-kalpaṁ sahajaṁ dhruvaṁ ca.

'This knowledge is not of the character of human reasoning, nor is it the meditation prescribed by yoga. It does not presuppose particular space and time. It is not obtained by means of the instruction from a preceptor. It is consciousness in its essence. It is Reality. It is like space. It is spontaneity. It is stable as well.'

Chāndogya (1.1.10): yadeva vidyayā karoti śraddhayopanīśadā tad eva vīryavattaraṁ bhavati.

'Whichever is accomplished by Vidyā (Brahma-Vidyā) so far defined, by means of devotion and the study of the Upanīśads alone is efficient.'

Kātha (1.2.3): naisā tarkena matir āpaneyā

'This knowledge is not something that can be produced by human reasoning, that is, empirical reasoning.'

Kātha (2 5.15): tamevabhāntaṁ anubhāti sarvaṁ

'All this shines after that shining truth.'

Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka (4 3 6): atmaivāśya jyotiḥ

'Self itself is its (Self's) illumination.'

Taittirīya (3 5): vijñānaṁ brahma.

'Specialised knowledge is Brahman.'

59. na jātoham mrto vāpi na me karma śubhāśubhaṁ viśuddhaṁ nirgunaṁ brahma bandho muktiḥ katham mama.

'I am not born I am not dead. I have no duty. No action of mine is good or evil. Pure and attributeless is Brahman. How can there be bondage or liberation to me?'

Chāndogya (8.4.1): na jarā na mṛtyuḥ na śokah na sukṛtaṁ na duṣkṛtaṁ. sarve pāpāno ato nivartante. apahata- pāpmā hy esa brahma-lokaḥ.

'There is no old age, no death, no misery, no merit, no demerit. All sins are removed from this. In it all sins are annulled. This is the location of Brahman.'

60. yadi sarva-gato devaḥ sthiraḥ pūrṇaḥ nirantaraḥ antaraṁ hi na paśyāmi sabāhyāntaraḥ katham?

'If this Divine Being is all-pervading, stable, complete, and distinctionless, than I do not see any distinction. How can there be the thought that it is outside and inside?'

Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka (2.5.19): tad etat brahma apūrvam anaparam anantaram abāhyam.

'That this Brahman is neither prior, nor posterior. It has nothing other. It has nothing that follows. It has nothing outside.'

61. sphuraty eva jagat kṛtsnam akhaṇḍita-nirantaram
aho māyā mahā-moho dvaitādvaita-vikalpanā.

'The whole world is presented as equipoise without break or interval or distinction. Verily māyā, nescience is a great delusion, an imagination of duality and non-duality.'

Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka-Upaniṣad (2.5.18): yaṁ puruṣaḥ sarvāsu pūrṣu puriṣayaḥ nainena kiṁ ca nānāvṛtam nainena kiṁcanāsamvṛtam.

'This spirit underlies all bodies. There is nothing that is not covered by this. There is nothing that is not filled up by this.'

62. sākāram ca nirākāram neti neti sarvadā bhedābheda-vinirmukto vartate kevalaḥ śivaḥ.

'The distinction such as that which is of form and that which is of no form is never existent. That which is, is devoid of distinction and identity. It is single and auspicious.'

Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka (2.3.6): asya śrīrbhavati ya evaṁ veda. athāta ādeśo neti neti na hy etasmād iti nety anyat param asti.

'To one who knows this truth, prosperity occurs. Further therefore the statement of the truth is this: nothing exists; nothing exists apart from this truth. There is nothing higher than this truth.'

63. na te ca mātā ca pitā ca bandhuḥ na te ca patnī na sutaś ca mitram na pakṣapāto na vipakṣapātaḥ katham hi santaptir iyaṁ hi citte?

'You have no mother, no father, no relative, no wife, no son, no friend, no party, not even non-party. Then how indeed are you justified in entertaining this anxiety in mind?'

Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka (3.5.1): yad eva sāksād aparokṣād brahma ya ātmā sarvāntaraḥ taṁ me vyācakṣva iti. eṣa te ātmā sarvāntaraḥ. katamo yājñavalkya sarvāntaraḥ yośanāyā pipāse śokaṁ moham jarām mṛtyum atyeti. etaṁ vai taṁ ātmānam veditvā brāhmaṇaḥ putrai śanāyāś ca vittaiśanāyāś ca lokaiśanāyāś ca vyutthāya atha bhikṣā-caryam caranti. Yā hyaiva putraiśanā sā vittaiśanā yā vittaiśanā sā lokaiśanā. ubhe hy ete eṣaṇe eva bhavataḥ. tasmāt brāhmaṇaḥ pāṇḍityam nirvidya bālyena tiṣṭhāset. bālyam ca pāṇḍityam ca nirvidya atha munih amaunaṁ ca maunaṁ ca nirvidya atha brāhmaṇaḥ. sa brāhmaṇaḥ kena syād yena syāt tenedṛṣa eva atonyad ārtam.

'That alone is direct and immediate consciousness. It is therefore Brahman. That is Self which is all-pervading. Teach me that. Thus this is Self in you. It is all-permeating. What is that, Yājñavalkya, which is all-permeating? It is that which transcends desire for food and drink, misery, delusion, old age and death. Thus indeed having understood self, they (the aspirants) become Brāhmanas. Having rendered themselves free from desire for sons, desire for wealth and desire for position, they then follow and practise non-possession. Just that which is desire for sons is the desire for wealth. That which is the desire for wealth is the desire for positions. Both these are nothing but desires. Therefore one who is a Brāhmaṇa ought to obtain the knowledge of Brahman and having obtained knowledge he leads the life of a youth. Having obtained knowledge and the life of a youth he is then a sage. Having thus obtained both non-silence and silence, he is then a Brāhmaṇa. This Brāhmaṇa leads the life of the nature which may be in this way or in that way, that is, he is satisfied with whatever comes to him. That which is other than this is imperfect, misery.'

64. divā naktam na te cittam udayāstamayau na hi videhasya śarīratvam kalpayanti katham budhāḥ?

'You have no day, no night, no mind. The sun does not rise and it does not set (for you). How can the wise super-impose body on that which is bodiless?'

Katha (2.4.5): yataś codeti sūryo astam yatra ca gacchati tam devāḥ sarve arpitāḥ tadū nātyeti kaścana.

'In that out of which the sun rises and into which it sets, all Gods disappear (because they have their origin there). Nothing goes beyond it.'

65. na vibhaktam vibhaktam ca na hi duḥkha-sukhādi ca na hi sarvaṁ asarvaṁ ca viddhi cātmānam avyayam.

'It is either non-separated, nor separated; neither pleasure, nor pain, nor anything else; neither universal nor particular. Understand Self to be inexhaustible.'

Mundaka (3.2.7): pare avyaye sarvā ekībhavanti.

All become one in the abode of this highest and inexhaustible.'

66. nāham kartā na bhoktā ca na me karma purādhunā na me deho videho vā nirmameti mameti kim.

'I am not a doer nor an enjoyer. There is no duty for me before or after. There is no body to me, nor no-body. Where is the necessity for me to see that something is not mine or mine.'

Brhad-Āraṇyaka (4.3.4): sā hovāca maitreyī ma iyaṁ bhagoḥ sarvā pṛthivī vittaena pūrṇā syāt sanv ahaṁ tena amṛtā aho. neti neti ho vāca. Yājñavalkyo yathopakaraṇavatām jīvitam tathaiva te jīvitam syāt. amṛtasya tu nāśāsti vitteneti. sā hovāca maitreyī yenāham nāmṛtā ayāṁ kim ahaṁ tena kuryām. yad eva bhagavān veda tad eva me vibrūhi iti.

'The same Maitreyī said, supposing this O Revered! My all this earth is filled up with wealth, by following it, can I become immortal? Never, never, said Yājñavalkya. With the life of those who have several accessories, your life also becomes one. There is absolutely no hope of immortality, by means of wealth. She, Maitreyī said, with that by which I do not become immortal what shall I do? Whichever the most revered knows that alone tell me.'

In this passage expressions vitta and upakaraṇa cover all the items that are irrelevant to immortality.

67. na me rāgādiko doṣo duḥkham dehādikaṁ na me ātmanam viddhi mām ekaṁ viśālaṁ gaganopamaṁ.

'In me there is no defect such as attachment. There is no pain such as body and so on in me. Understand me to be Self which is one, extended and similar to space.'

Chāndogya (4.11.1): soham asmi sa evāham asmi.

'He I am. He alone I am.'

Chāndogya (6.10.3): sa ātma tattvaṁ asi.

'It is Ātman. You are that.'

Aitareya (2.3.13): sa etaṁ eva puruṣaṁ brahma tatamaṁ apaśyat.

'He realised this Self (puruṣa) alone as Brahman and all-permeating.'

Brhad-Āraṇyaka (2.4.5): na vā are sarvasya kāmāya sarvaṁ priyaṁ bhavati. ātmanas tu kāmāya sarvaṁ priyaṁ bhavati.

'O dear! Because of the desire of all, all does not become liked. Because of the desire of Self all become liked.'

The fact of liking something does not prove the truth of individuality. It rather proves the truth of Self, the author of all.

68. sakhe manah kim bahu jalpītena sakhe manah sarvam idam vitarkyam yat sāra-bhūtam kathitam mayā te tvam eva tattvam gaganopamosi

'O Mind, my friend! What is the good of much speaking? O Mind, my friend! All this is to be suspected That which is fundamentally true is expounded by me to you You are the Reality. You are like space.'

Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka (2 4 5): ātmāvāre draṣṭavyaḥ śrotavyo mantavyo nididhyāsitavyaḥ. . . . maitreyī ātmanī khalv are drṣṭe śrute vijnāte idam sarvam viditam

'O Dear! Ātman alone ought to be realised, understood, reflected on and meditated on O Maitreyī, if Ātman, Self is realised, understood and appreciated, then all this becomes known '

69 yena kenāpi bhāvena yatra kutra mrtā api yoginah tatra liyante ghaṭākāśam ivāmbare

'In whatever circumstance and wheresoever the yogins, spiritual aspirants, may end their life, they disappear in it (Reality), as they are like the space conditioned by the jar disappearing in the larger space '

70 tirthē cāntya-gehe vā naṣṭa-smṛtir api tyajan sama-kāle tanum muktah kaivalya-vyāpako bhavet.

'In the presence of sacred water or in the house of an outcaste, even though memory fails to him if an aspirant leaves his body after apprehending the truth of equipoise, he becomes the attainer of aloofness '

69 and 70.

Chāndogya (4.15 6) atha yadu caiva asmin śavyam kurvanti yadica na arcisam eva abhisam-bhavanti . . . arcisah sa enān brahma gamayati.

'Further in the case of this person (of wisdom) whether they observe funeral ceremonies or not, those persons (like him) go to the world of fire (they follow the path of fire). . . He (vāyu) takes them from the world of fire to Brahman.'

71. dharmārtha-kāma-mokṣāṁś ca dvīpadādi-carācaram manyante yoginah sarvam marici-jala-sannibham

'Duty, wealth, desire and release, and the creatures such as those that have two legs as well as non-moving entities, all this the yogins see to be similar to a mirage.'

Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka (1.3.8): asato mā sadgamaya.

'Take me from the unreal to the real.'

What is called 'the unreal' in this passage is compared to a mirage in the Avadhūta-Gītā.

72. atitānāgataṁ karma vartamānaṁ tathaiva ca
 na karomi na bhunjāmi iti me niścalā matiḥ.

'Of the action past, future and present, I am not the doer nor am I the enjoyer. This is what I see and this gives no room for doubt.'

Muṇḍaka (3.1.1): tayor anyañ pippalaṁ svādv atti anaśnan anyo abhicākaśīti.

'Of the two (entities) one (the individual self) suffers from the result of its action. The other (Brahman) without enjoyment illumines in all.'

Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka (3.8.8): na tad aśnāti kimcana.

na tad aśnāti kaścana.

'It (Brahman) does not enjoy anything. No body enjoys It, that is, there is no body apart from It.'

73. śūnyāgāre samarasa-pūtaḥ tiṣṭhan ekaḥ sukhaṁ avadhūtaḥ carati hi nagnaḥ tyaktvā garvaṁ vindati kevalaṁ ātmani sarvaṁ.

'In the abode of spiritual bliss, purified by the essence of equipoise, living happily, with no companion the philosopher moves on being nude, i.e. depending on nothing, without egoism. He sees Self to be all-complete.'

The Vedic word śūnya means spiritual bliss.

Muṇḍaka (3.1.4): vijānan vidvān bhavate nātivādī ātma-kriḍaḥ ātma-ratiḥ kriyāvān. eṣa brahma-vidāṁ variṣṭhaḥ.

'Understanding Self (that is, Brahman), the aspirant becomes wise. He does not speak much. He is engaged in Self. His amusement is in Self. He is active. He is the highest of those that know Brahman. Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka (4.4.7): atha martyo amṛto bhavati. atra brahma samaśnuta iti.

'Further (when all desires are extinguished) the mortal man becomes immortal. In this state he understands Brahman.'

74. tritaya turīyam nahi nahi yatra vindati kevalam ātmani tatra dharmādharmo nahi nahi yatra baddho muktaḥ katham iha tatra?

'Where there is never the three-fold state as well as the fourth one, in the circumstance in which the self is seen to be all-complete, there is never duty nor no-duty. How can there be the one who is bound or the one who is liberated?'

Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka (2.3 6): athāta ādeśaḥ neti neti. na hy etasmād iti nety anyat param asti. atha nāmadheyam satyasya satyam. iti. 'Further, for you the instruction is "not, not". Not indeed from this. Thus there is not something else that is higher. Further, the name, that is, the definition (of this truth). The Real of the Real. Thus.'

75. vindati vindati nahi nahi mantram chando-lakṣanam nahi nahi tantram
samarasa-magno bhāvita-pūtaḥ pralapitam etat param avadhūtaḥ.

'He does not know any hymn called Veda. He does not indeed know any hymn called Veda. Nor does he know any practice. Nor does he indeed know any practice. He is absorbed in the absolute truth signified as equipoise. He is purified by meditation. This highest truth is well expounded (by him). He is the philosopher.'

Kaṭha (1.2.15): sarve vedāḥ yat padam āmananti. . . . tat te padam sangraheṇa bravāmi. aum ity etat. . . . kas taṁ madāmadam devam madanyo jñātum arhati.

'All Vedas reveal the nature of this Truth. . . . This nature I tell you briefly. . . . aum is this. . . . How can any one other than myself be able to know this shining one which is of the nature of the bliss of the bliss.'

76. sarva-śūnyam aśūnyam ca satyāsatyam na vidyate
svabhāva-bhāvataḥ proktaṁ śāstra-samvitti-pūrvakam.

'There is neither all-void nor non-void; neither real nor non-real. This is expounded on the strength of knowledge in essence made explicit by philosophy.'

Kaṭha (1.2.9-12-22): naiṣa tarkena matir āpaneyā proktānyenaiva sujñānāya preṣṭā. . . . tam durdarśam gūḍham anupraviṣṭam guhāhitam gahvareṣṭham purānam adhyātma-yogādhyugamena devam matvā dhīraḥ. . . . tasyaiṣa ātmā vivṛṇute tanūm svām.

'This knowledge is not something that can be produced by human reasoning. The instruction given by a proper preceptor alone, O Dear! can produce that knowledge which is defectless. . . . It (Self) transcends perception. It is hidden. It is all pervading. It is located in the innermost region of the heart. It is beyond reach. It is beloved. It pervades all bodies. By means of practising discipline pertaining to the truth of Self, having understood this shining one, a person becomes a man of wisdom . . . whom this Self chooses to be its own, to him it reveals its form.'

iti śrī dattātreyā-viracitāyām avadhūta-gītāyām ātma-saṁvitti-upadeśo nāma prathamodhyāyaḥ.

'Thus ends the First Chapter entitled "The Instruction of Knowledge in the Avadhūta-Gītā composed by Śrī Dattātreyā".'

CHAPTER II

Avadhūta teaches:

1. bālasya vā viṣaya-bhoga-ratasya vāpi mūrkhasya sevaka-janasya gr̥ha-sthitasya etad-guroḥ kiṁ api naiva vicintanīyam ratnaṁ kathaṁ tyajati kopy aśucau pratiṣṭhaṁ?

'There need be no concern whether the Guru happens to be a boy or a man or one who is found gratified with pleasures of sense or seems obstinate, whether he be a slave or a householder. For who will reject a gem for the mere reason that it is found in an impure place?'

Muṇḍaka (3.1.10): tasmād ātmajñaṁ hy arcayet bhūti-kāmaḥ.

'Therefore one who aspires after his well-being must adore the knower of the Self.'

Chāndogya (4.9.1-3): satyakāmā iti. bhagava iti ha prati-śuśrāva. brahma-vidiva vai somya bhāsi. ko nu tvā anuśaśāsa? iti. anye manuṣyebhyaḥ iti ha pratijagne. bhagavaṁ stv eva me kāmāṁ brūyāt. śrutaṁ hy eva me bhagavad-dṛṣebhyaḥ—ācāryāddhy eva vidyā veditā sādhiṣṭaṁ prāpayatīti—tasmai hyaitad evovāca—atna na kiṁ ca na viyāyeti, viyāyeti.

'O satyakāmā! Thus he addressed. Revered Sir! Thus he answered. My good student! Indeed, you shine as though you know Brahman. Who did instruct you? Thus he asked. Those that are different from men. Thus indeed he replied. The revered master himself must kindly teach me as he likes. I have heard that knowledge imparted by preceptors like you becomes rooted. Thus he said. He (the preceptor) told him indeed only the following. There is nothing lost—nothing lost.'

Chāndogya (4.14.1):

te hocuḥ upakosala, esa somya te asmad-vidyā ātma-vidya ca ācāryas tu te gatim vaktā itī.

'They (the Gods) said, O Upakosala! This is, O Dear! for you the science dealing with us as well as the science dealing with Self. Your preceptor is the person to tell you the correct path.'

The idea is that the preceptor is justified merely because he is the preceptor.

2. naivātra kāvya-guna eva tu cintanīyo grāhyah param guṇavatā khalu sāra eva sindūra citra rahitā bhuvī rūpa- śūnyā pāram na kim nayati naur iha gantu-kāmān?

'His (the preceptor's) teaching ought not to be judged from the accepted standpoint of literary excellence. By one who is indeed after truth, only the essence ought to be apprehended. Does not a boat even though it lacks beauty and is unpainted in colours carry through those that want to cross (a river) to the other bank?'

Mundaka (1.5): atha parā yayā tad akṣaram adhigamyate. . . .
na cakṣuṣā grhyate nāpi vācā. esonur ātmā cetasā veditavyah

'That exposition is the highest by which that imperishable Truth is understood . . . the Truth cannot be apprehended by eye or by speech. The subtle Self can be appreciated only by mind.'

This appreciation is not governed by the merits merely linguistic in character.

3. prayatnena vinā yena niścalena calācalam grastam svabhāvatah śāntam caitanyam gaganopamam.

'Without a steady effort, the Self, which is of the character of peace, which is identical with the entities moving and non-moving and is similar to space is grasped of its own accord.'

Taittirīya (2.8): ānandah. śrotṛiyasya ca akāmahatasya.

'The spiritual bliss occurs to one who is devoted to Śruti and who is not distracted by desire.'

Every will, is conditioned by desire. Hence it is not required to understand Truth.

Kaṭha (1.2.23): nāśānta-mānaso vāpi prajñānenainam āpnuyāt.
 'The person whose mind is distracted does never indeed attain to this Truth (Self) by means of wisdom.'

4. ayatnāc cālayed yas tu ekaṁ eva carācaram sarvagam tat katham bhinnam advaitam vartate mama.
 'Spontaneously if one understands this Truth which is only one, which is both moving and non-moving entities, which is all-pervading, then how can it be different? To me there is only one Truth, identity, that is equipoise.'

Kaṭha (2.4.11): manasaivedam āptavyam neha nānāsti kimcana.
 'Truth ought to be appreciated within the mind; (because) It is devoid of distinction.'

5. aham eva param yasmāt sārāsārataram śivam gamāgama-vinirmuktaṁ nirvikalpaṁ nirākulaṁ.
 'I alone am the Highest; I am the substantial and the insubstantial, the holy, and neither moving to and fro, an indeterminate and unperplexed.'

Kaṭha (1.2.20): āsīno dūram vrajati śayāno yāti sarvataḥ . . .
 mahāntam vibhum ātmānam. . . .
 'Sitting it goes farther. Lying it goes everywhere. . . . The highest, all-pervading Self. . . .'

6. sarvāvayava-nirmuktaṁ tathāham tridaśārcitaṁ sampūrṇatvān na gṛhāmi vibhāgam tridaśādikaṁ.
 'That which is devoid of all limbs is myself. It is that which is worshipped by Gods. Because it is complete I do not see the division such as Gods and so on (in it).'

Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka (1.4.7-10): atmety evopāsīta. atra hy ete sarva ekaṁ bhavanti. . . . aham manur abhavam sūryaśceti tadidaṁ apy etarhi ya evam veda. aham brahmāsmīti sa idagm sarvam bhavati.
 'It (the Truth) ought to be meditated on as Self. In this Truth all become one. . . . I became Manu and also Sūrya. If a person indeed knows this (the Truth so far expounded) as "I am Brahman", he indeed becomes all this, that is, he indeed becomes all-complete.'

Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka (2.4.14): yatra vā asya sarvam ātmaivābhūt tat kena kaṁ. . . . paśyet.

'In this circumstance indeed in the case of this aspirant everything became Self Itself. In this case by what means what can one see?'

Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka (2.5.15): sa vā ayam ātmā sarveṣāṃ bhūtānāṃ adhipatiḥ. . . . asmin ātmani sarvāṃ bhūtāni sarve devāḥ sarve lokāḥ sarve prānāḥ sarva eta ātmanah samarpitāḥ.

'That this Self is the Lord of all creatures. . . . In this Self all creatures, all Gods, all worlds, all vital principles, all (individual) selves became dedicated, that is, their individuality was lost there '

7. pramādena na sandehah kiṃ kariṣyāmi vṛttivān utpadyante vliyante budbudāś ca yathā jale.

'Owing to illusion there is no doubt or suspicion caused (with regard to the Reality). (In the presence of illusion) what is the use of being a good or a wicked man? Things come into being and go out of it even as bubbles on the surface of water.'

Kaṭha (2.5 13): nityo nityānām.

'(The Truth is) the eternal of the eternal.'

Kaṭha (1.2.10): nahyadhruvaḥ prāpyate hi dhruvaṃ tat.

'That enduring one cannot indeed be attained by means of non-enduring means.'

8. mahadādīni bhūtāni samāpyaivaṃ sadaiva hi mṛdudravyesu tikṣneṣu guḍeṣu kaṭukeṣu ca.

'The entities mahat and so on end indeed always in the same manner in things—soft, hard, tasteful and non-tasteful.'

Kaṭha (2.4.3): yena rūpaṃ rasam gandham śabdam sparśāṃś ca maithunān. etenaiva vijānāti kiṃ atra pariśiṣyate.

'Colour, taste, smell, sound, touch and contact are due to this All knowing is on account of this. Then what remains for one to say?'

9. kaṭutvam caiva śaityatvam mṛdutatvam ca yathā jale prakṛtiḥ puruṣaḥ tadvat abhinnaṃ pratibhāti me.

'Hardness, coldness and softness are found to co-exist in water. Similarly matter and spirit, it seems to me, co-exist in inseparability.'

Kaṭha (1.3.11): avyaktāt puruṣaḥ paraḥ puruṣān na paraṃ kiṃcīt sā kāṣṭhā sā parā gatiḥ.

'Spirit transcends matter. Nothing is there that transcends spirit. That is the summit and the summum bonum.'

This passage leads to the conclusion that there is absolutely no distinction in Self. This is therefore the process of finding out the Absolute in which all conditions and therefore all distinctions disappear. This truth is illustrated by such passages as:—

Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka (2.1.20): sa yathorṇanābhiḥ tantunocaret yathāgneḥ kṣudrā viṣphulingāḥ vyuccaranti evaṁ evāsmād-ātmanāḥ sarve prāṇāḥ sarve lokāḥ sarve devāḥ sarvāṇi bhūtāni vyuccaranti. 'As the web is uttered by the spider, as sparks scintillate from fire, so all lives, all worlds, all gods, all things are uttered by the Self.'

Mundaka (2.1.1): tadetat satyam. yathā sudiptāt pāvakāt viṣphulingāḥ sahasraśaḥ prabhavante sarūpāḥ tathākṣarāt vividhāḥ somya bhāvāḥ prajāyante tatra caivāpi yanti.

'This is the truth. As from a flaming fire sparks are scintillated in thousands, so from the Imperishable Reality, multifarious entities emanate and return to it.'

10. sarvākhyā-rahitaṁ yad yat sūkṣmāt sūkṣmataram param manobuddhīndriyātitaṁ akalanikaṁ jagatpatiṁ.

'Devoid of all names, the subtlest of the subtle, the highest conceivable transcending mind, intellect and the senses, the taintless and the Lord of the Universe.'

Chāndogya (6.4.5): etaddhasma vai tadvidvāgmsaḥ āhuḥ. . . . aśrutaṁ amataṁ avijnātaṁ . . . iti. . . .

'It is indeed this and this alone that the wise said . . . not heard, not known and not understood . . . thus.'

Kena (1.4) yad vācānabhyuditaṁ.

'That which is not expounded by means of speech.'

11. idṛśaṁ sahajaṁ yatra ahaṁ tatra kathaṁ bhava tvaṁ evahi kathaṁ tatra kathaṁ tatra carācaram.

'If the Truth is spontaneously appreciated in this manner, in that circumstance how can I (individual) exist? How can you (the individual) exist? How can the moving and the non-moving entities exist there?'

Chāndogya (6.10.3): sa ya eṣonimaitadātmyaṁ idaṁ sarvaṁ.

'That which is so far expounded is this Truth. It is very subtle. All this is of this self.'

Kaṭha (1.1.6): nityaṁ vibhuṁ sarvagataṁ susūkṣmaṁ.

'It is eternal, all-pervading, omnipresent and subtlemost.'

Taittirīya (2.7): etasmin adṛśye anātmye anilayane anirukte.

'In this which is beyond perception, being the self of all which is selfless, being the abode of all which is abodeless and being the source of speech as such which is beyond speech.'

12. gaganopamam tu yat proktaṁ tad eva gaganopmām caitanyam doṣa-hīnaṁ ca sarvajñaṁ pūrṇaṁ eva ca

'The Truth is expounded to be similar to space. The same truth which is similar to space is spiritual, defectless, omniscient and complete.'

Kātha (2.5.13). cetanaḥ cetanānām.

'It is the spirit of the spirits.' For it is the source of all that is spiritual.

Muṇḍaka (2.2.7): yassarvajñaḥ sarvavit.

'It knows all and obtains all.'

Chāndogya (8 4.1): sarva pāpmāno ato nivartante apahata-pāpmā

'All sins are removed from this. It is that in which all sins are annulled.'

13. prithivyām. caritaṁ naiva mārutena ca vāhitaṁ vārinā pihitaṁ naiva tejo-madhye vyavasthitaṁ.

'It is not indeed something that takes place on earth (that belongs to earth) It is not carried away by air It is not obscured by water. It is not found in the midst of fire.'

Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka (3 8.15): yas sarvesu bhūtesu tiṣṭhan . sarvāni bhūtāni . . . antaro yamayati

'It is that which is in all creatures . . . which controls all creatures from within.'

14. ākāśam tena samvyāptaṁ na tad vyāptaṁ ca kenacit sa bāhyābhyantaram tiṣṭhaty avacchinnaṁ nirantaram.

'Space is pervaded by It. But nothing pervades It. It exists both inside and outside simultaneously It is unlimited. It is undivided.'

Kātha (2.5.8). tad u nātyeti kaścana.

'Nothing goes beyond It, that is, Nothing pervades It.'

15. sūkṣmatvāt tad adṛśyatvāt nirgunatvāc ca yogibhiḥ ālambanādi yat proktaṁ kramād ālambanaṁ bhavet.

'Because it is subtle, because it is unseen and also because it is qualityless, that which is, by the aspirants taken to be the basis (the object of meditation) becomes basis veritably.'

The idea is that meditation does not start from the knowledge of Truth. Rather the knowledge of Truth gradually emerges from meditation. Hence meditation on the Truth is contradiction in terms.

Muṇḍaka (1.6). yat tad adreṣyam agrāhyam.

'That which is beyond thought, beyond contemplation.'

Kaṭha (1.2.17): etad-ālambanam śreṣṭham etad-ālambanam param.
'To depend upon this object of meditation is the best. It is the highest.'

16. satatābhyāsa-yuktas tu nirālambo yadā bhavet tal-layāt-liyate nāntarguṇadoṣa-vivarjitah.

'When a person engaged in ceaseless spiritual endeavour will have no anchor for his meditation, he is lost, and it is impossible for him to get rid of the merits and demerits in him.'

Kaṭha (2.6.15): yadā sarve prabhidhante hṛdayasyeha granthayaḥ, atha martyo amṛto bhavati.

'When all the knots of the heart are cut asunder, then the mortal becomes the immortal.'

Kaṭha (1.2.12): adhyātma-yogādhighamena devaṁ matvā.

'Having understood the Divine by means of spiritual discipline pertaining to the truth of the Self. . . .' What is presented as "divine" in this passage is what is presented as ālamḃana, basis, in the previous passages.'

17. viṣa-viśvasya raudrasya moha-mūrchā-pradasya ca ekam eva vināśāya hy amogham saha-jāmṛtam.

'There is only one precious remedy to get rid of the world poison, which is terrible, deluding and dementing and that is the ambrosia of equipoise.'

Kaṭha (1.3.2): abhayam titīṛṣatām pāram.

'The safest bank for those who want to cross (the ocean of bondage).'

18. bhāva-gamyam nirākāram sākāram dṛṣṭi-gocaram bhāvābhāva-vinirmuktaṁ antarālam tad ucyate.

'Being formless it is apprehended by insight, as having form it is perceivable by the eye. The innermost Self is said to be indescribable as being or non-being.'

The same is expounded in the following verses:

Kaṭha (2.4.11): manasaivedam āptavyam.

'This is something that can be realised only by insight.'

19. bāhya-bhāvam bhaved viśvam antaḥ prakṛtir ucyate antarādantaram jneyam nārikela-phalāmbuvat.

'In its outward aspect it becomes the cosmos and in its inner aspect comes to be known as Nature. It is to be understood as the innermost of the inner like the sweet water within the cocoanut.'

Kaṭha (2.2.6): guhyam brahma sanātanam.

'The secret, the most ancient is Brahman.'

Bṛhad-Āranyaka (3.7.15): yah sarveṣu bhūteṣu tiṣṭhan . . . sarvāni bhūtānyantaro yamayati eṣa ta ātmā antaryāmy amṛtaḥ.

'It (Self) being within all creatures . . . controls within all creatures. This is your Self. It controls from within. It is immortal.'

20. bhrānti-jñānam sthitam bāhyam samyag jñānam ca madhyagam

madhyān madhyataram jneyam nārikela-phalāmbuvat.

'Outermost knowledge is knowledge of appearance. Correct knowledge is in the middle and within the middle lies concealed the highest thing to be known. It is like the sweet water inside the cocoanut.'

Kena (1.3). anyad eva tat veditāt atho aviditād adhi.

'It is other than all that is known. Further it is beyond all that is not known.'

21. paurnamāsyām yathā candra eka evātinirmalah tena tat-sadṛśam paśyet bheda-dṛṣṭiḥ viparyayaḥ

'The moon on the full moon day is one only and is very clear. One ought to understand the Truth to be similar to it The thought of difference is an illusion.'

Bṛhad-Āranyaka (3.1.6): tad yad idam manah so sau candrah sa brahma sāmuktiḥ.

'That this is mind. That this is moon. It is Brahman. It is freedom.'

22. anenaiva prakārena buddhi-bhedo na sarvagah dātā ca dhīratām eti gīyate nāma-koṭibhiḥ.

'In view of the previous ideas, difference in apprehension is not universal. One who gives knowledge (of the truth) becomes a hero. He is to be applauded in crores of names.'

Bṛhad-Āranyaka (1.4.10): ya evam veda aham brahmāsmi sa idam sarvam bhavati. tasya ha na devās ca nābhūtyā īśate. ātmā hy eṣām sa bhavati.

'He who knows "I am Brahman" he indeed becomes all this. In his case even the Gods are unable to do evil The Self indeed of them he becomes.'

23. guru-prajñā-prasādena mūrkhō vā yadi paṇḍitaḥ yastu sambudhyate tattvam virakto bhava-sāgarāt.

'By means of the knowledge which is purely the gift of the preceptor, if a person, whether he is (said to be) a fool or a learned man, understands Truth then he is detached from the ocean of bondage.'

Taittirīya (1.11.2): vedam anūcyācāryonte vāsinaṁ anu-śāsti . . . acāryāya priyaṁ dhanam āhṛtya . . . acārya devo bhava.

'After having taught the Veda the preceptor instructs the pupil. . . . Having paid the preceptor that money which pleases him . . . become one to whom the preceptor is God.'

24. rāgadveṣa-vinirmuktaḥ sarvabhūta-hite rataḥ dṛḍha-bodhaḥ ca dhīras ca sa gacchet paramaṁ padam.

'The person who is free from attachment and hatred, who is intent upon doing good to all creatures, whose knowledge is stable and who is undeluded attains to the highest Truth.'

Kaṭha (1.3.9): vijñāna-sārathir yas tu manaḥ-pragrahavān naraḥ sodhvanaḥ pāram āpnoti tad viṣṇoḥ paramaṁ padam.

'He who is directed by specialised knowledge; the man whose mind is under perfect control: It is he who reaches the end of the path (of spiritual discipline). That is the highest abode of Viṣṇu.'

25. ghaṭe bhinne ghaṭākāśa ākāśe liyate yathā dehābhāve tathā yogi svarūpe paramātmāni.

'After the destruction of a jar, even as the space contained in it merges in the larger space, the spiritual aspirant in the absence of body merges in his own essence which is no other than the highest Self.'

Taittirīya (3.10.4-5): sa yaścāyam puruṣe. yaś cāsāvāditye. sa ekaḥ.
sa ya evaṁ vit. asmāḷlokāt pretya—kāmarūpyanu-sancaran—suvarṇa jyotiḥ. ya evaṁ veda. ityupaniṣad.

'He is the same who is in the individual Self. He alone is in the sun. He is one. One who knows the truth in this manner after death (going out) from this world—moving on taking the form according to his desire (becomes) illumination which is the same as spiritual bliss. He who knows this truth in the manner expounded here. This is the conclusion arrived at by the Upaniṣad.'

26. ukteyaṁ karma-yuktānāṁ matir yāntepi sā gatiḥ na cuktā yoga-yuktānāṁ matir yāntepi sā gatiḥ.

'The knowledge which is prescribed for those who have duties and which is said to be their protection to the very end is not prescribed for those who practise spiritual discipline and it is not their protection to the very end.'

Mundaka (1.2.7): avaram-karma. etat śreyo ye abhinandanti mūḍhāḥ jarā mrtyuṃ te punar evāpiyanti.

'Inferior is action Those who hold that this is good are fools. Again they surely have old age and death.'

27. yā gatiḥ karma-yuktānām sā ca vāgindriyād vadet yoginām yā gatiḥ kvāpi hy akathyā bhavatorjitā

'It is possible to say by means of speech the direction of those that have duty But the direction that the spiritual aspirants have cannot be stated by you It is the direction which is full of promise (beyond speech).'

Mundaka (1.2.7) plavā hy ete adrḍhā yajna-rūpāḥ.

'These disciplines called sacrifices are boats weak and unsafe in their construction.'

Mundaka (1.2.10) istāpūrtam manyamānā varistham nānyat śreyo samvidante pramūḍāḥ.

'Thinking that sacrifice and charity are the best of disciplines, those fools never understand that the real discipline is something else'

28. evam jñātvā tvamum mārgam yoginām naiva kalpitam vikalpa-mārjanam tesām svayam siddhiḥ pravartate.

'For the spiritual aspirants who know this path, the state of being affected by imagination does not occur To them realisation occurs of its own accord'

Mundaka (2.8) bhidhyate hrdaya-granthiḥ chidyante sarva-saṁśayāḥ. kṣiyante cāśya karmāṇi tasmin drṣṭe parāvare

'The knot of the heart is cut asunder, all doubts are answered and all the actions of the aspirant are exhausted when the highest Truth is realised.'

29. tirthē vā antyaja gehe vā yatra kutra mṛtopi vā na yogi paśyate garbham pare brahmani liyate.

'In the presence of the holy water or in the house of an outcaste or in whichever place he meets his end, the spiritual aspirant does not see rebirth and he merges in Brahman, the highest.'

Chūndogya (4-15-6): atha yad u caivāsmiṃ śavyam karma kurvanti yadi ca na arcīṣam evābhi saṁbhavati . . . imam mānavam āvartam nāvartante nāvartante.

'Further, with regard to the man of wisdom, whether they conduct the funeral ceremony or not he goes to the world of illumination. . . . They (such persons) again do not go through the whirl of human cycle. They do not indeed go through the whirl of human cycle.'

30. sahajam ajam acintyam yas tu paśyet svarūpaṁ ghaṭati yadi yatheṣṭam lipyate naiva doṣaiḥ sakṛd api tadabhāvāt karma kiṁ cin na kuryāt tad api na ca vibaddaḥ saṁyamī vā tapasvī.

'Spontaneous, unborn, ununderstandable is the essence (Truth). If one realises it and to one's entire satisfaction enjoys it, then one is never tainted by defects. Merely because this realisation has not occurred even once, one ought not to follow the path of action. This is how a mendicant or a person who practises austerity is not bound (by action).'

Muṇḍaka (3.2.2): kāmān yaḥ kāmāyate manyamānaḥ sa kāmabhiḥ jāyate tatra tatra. paryāpta-kāmasya kṛtātmanastu ihaiva sarve praviliyanti kāmāḥ.

'He who desires things even though he knows (the truth) becomes born here and there owing to desires. But in the case of one in whom desires come to an end and who has made one's self accomplished, that is, who has understood Self, in this very life all desires come to an end.'

31. nirmayaṁ niṣpratimaṁ nirākṛtiṁ nirāśrayaṁ nirvapuṣaṁ nirāśiṣaṁ nirdvandva nirmohaṁ alupta-śaktikaṁ taṁ īśaṁ ātmānamupaiti śāśvataṁ.

'That which is defectless, that which is not similar to anything, that which is formless, that which needs no support, that which needs no body, that which needs no food, that which is not conditioned by anything, that which makes illusion impossible, that the power of which is never modified, that is the Lord Self, ever enduring. Him he attains.'

Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka (4.3.32): eṣāsyā paramā gatiḥ. eṣāsyā paramā saṁpat. eṣosya paramo lokaḥ. eṣosya parama ānandaḥ. etasyaivānandasya anyāni bhūtāni mātrāṁ upajīvanti.

'This (Brahman) is the highest goal of the spiritual aspirant. This is the highest wealth. This is his highest position. This is his highest bliss. All other creatures live indeed on the speck of this bliss.'

32. vedo na dikṣā na ca munḍana-kriyā gurur na śiṣyo na ca yatra saṃpadah mudrādikam cāpi na yatra bhāsate
tam īśam ātmānam upaiti śāśvatam

'No manifest need is here of Veda, discipline, sacrifice connected with removing hair, teacher, pupil, wealth of different kinds and religious marks. He attains thus the eternal supreme Self.'

Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka (4.3.22). atra pitā apitā bhavati mātā amātā lokā alokā devā adevā vedā avedāh . . . tīrno hi tadā sarvān śokān. . .

'In this (truth of Self) father is no father, mother is no mother, worlds are no worlds, gods are no gods, Vedas are no Vedas . . .
(the spiritual aspirant) in this circumstance has transcended all miseries.'

33. na śāmbhavam śāktika-mānavam na vā pindam ca rūpam ca padādikam na vā ārambha-niṣpatti ghaṭādikam ca no
tam īśam ātmānam upaiti śāśvatam.

'There is no greatness attributed to Śāmbhu, no greatness attributed to Śakti, no greatness attributed to Manu, there is no content, no form, no limbs feet and so on, no entity such as a jar which is produced and furnished. That is the Lord Self ever enduring. Him he attains.'

Muṇḍaka (3.2.10-11): tadetat rcābhyuktam. kriyāvantah śrotriyāh brahmanisthāh svayam juhuta ekarṣi śraddhāvantah tesām evaisām brahma vidyām vadeta tadetat satyam . . . naitad acirna vrato adhite.

'This that is so far expounded is established by the hymn. These that are active (in the direction of knowledge), those that are devoted to Śruti, those that are devoted to Brahman, those that have self-sacrifice, those that have allegiance to one seer, that is, the seer of Veda, only to these this science of Brahman ought to be taught.
What is stated so far is true. This science, one who has not taken a vow shall not study.'

34. yasya svarūpāt sacarācaram jagad utpadyate tiṣṭhati liyatepi vā payo-vikārād iva phena-budbudās
tam īśam ātmānam upaiti śāśvatam.

'This is Its essence from which the whole world, moving and non-moving, is produced, maintained and destroyed even as the bubbles on the foam owing to the change in water. That is the Lord Self, the all-enduring. Him he attains.'

Taittirīya (3.1): yato vā imāni bhūtāni jāyante. yena jātāni jivanti. yat prayanti abhi samviśanti. tad vijijnāsasva tad brahmeti.

'From which all these creatures are born, by which those that are born are maintained, in which they are destroyed, into which they enter, enquire into It. That is Brahman. This the conclusion.'

35. nāsā-nirodho na ca dṛṣṭir āsanam bodhopy abodhopi na yatra bhāsate nāḍī-pracāropi na yatra kiñcit
 tam īśam ātmānam upaiti śāśvatam.

'No breath-control need we here, nor the steady stare nor the postures of the body. Nothing is here to be learned or unlearned, nor need we the regulation of nerves. One merely attains the Supreme and Eternal Self.'

Kaṭha (2.6.16): śatam caikā ca hṛdayasya nāḍyah tāsām mūrdhānam abhinissṛtaikā. tayordhvaṁ āyan amṛtatvaṁ etī.

'The nerves that belong to the heart are one hundred and one. Above all of them, that is, at the top of them there is extended one nerve. The person who transcends, that is, goes above both these (nerves) attains to immortality.'

36. nānātvam ekatvam ubhatvam anyatā aṇutva-dīrghatva-mahatva-śūnyatā mānatva-meyatva-samatva-varjitam
 tam īśam ātmānam upaiti śāśvatam.

'There is (in the truth) the absence of manifoldness, oneness, duality, otherness, infinitesimalness, length and largeness. It is devoid of the state of being proved by something else. It is devoid of the state of being an object. It is devoid of the state of being compared to other things. That is the Lord Self, the all-enduring. Him he attains.'

Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka (3.8.8): sa hovāca etaddhaitad akṣaram gārgi brāhmaṇā abhivadanti asthūlam anaṇu ahrasvaṁ adīrgham. . . .

'He (Yāhnavalkya) said—Indeed similarly as those brāhmaṇas teach, O Gārgi! this imperishable Truth is that which is not gross, not infinitesimal, not short, not long. . . .'

37. susamīyamī vā yadī vā na samīyamī susangrahī vā yadī vā na sangrahī niskarmako vā sakarmakah
 taṁ īśaṁ ātmānam upaiti śāśvatam.

'Whether he is a mendicant or a non-mendicant, whether he has amassed wealth or has not amassed wealth, whether he has not done his ritualistic duty or has done his ritualistic duty, he attains the Lord Self, the all-enduring.'

Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka (3.8.10) 'ya etad akṣaram gārgi viditvā asmāi lokāt praiti sa brāhmaṇaḥ.

'He who, O Gargi! having understood this imperishable Truth goes out of this world is Brāhmaṇa.'

- 38 mano na buddhiḥ na śarīraṁ indriyaṁ tanmātra-bhūtāni na bhūta-pancakam ahamkrtis cāpi viyat-svarūpakam
 taṁ īśaṁ ātmānam upaiti śāśvatam.

'There is no mind, no intellect, no body, no sense organ, no subtle elements, no five-fold element, no "I"ness. (the truth) is of the nature of space. That is the Lord Self, the all-enduring. Him he attains.'

Kaṭha (1.2.21) aśarīraṁ śarīresu . . . mahāntam vibhum ātmānam matvā dhīro na śocati

'(The Self) is bodiless in the bodies. . . . It is the highest. It is omnipotent. It is Self. Having understood this, an aspirant becomes a man of wisdom. He does not suffer misery.'

- 39 vidhau nirodhe paramātmataṁ gate na yoginas cetasi bhedavarjite śaucam na vāśaucam alingabhāvanā sarvam vidheyam yadvā niśidhyate.

'If all the commandment is negated, if everything is realised to be the highest Self, if the mind is free from dualistic ideas, and if the talk of luck and so on are abandoned, then in the case of that aspirant there is neither purity nor impurity, nor the distinction of sex.'

Kaṭha (1.2.14) 'anyatra dharmāt anyatrādharmāt anyatrāsmāt kṛtākṛtāt. anyatra bhūtāc ca bhavyāc ca yat tat paśyasi tadvada. 'Beyond duty, beyond non-duty, beyond this which is done and beyond this which is not done, beyond what is past and beyond what is to come, that which you see tell me that. . . .'

'If that is what (which) mind and speech are not capable of expounding, where then is the possibility of having instruction from a preceptor with reference to it? From the (real) preceptor who has received this discourse and who has realised the union with that Truth, the Truth of equipoise itself shines indeed.'

‘Having disowned all egohood the student ought to go to a guru (teacher) who follows the tradition of Śruti and who is devoted to Brahman (as expounded by Śruti).’

Chāndogya (4.14.1): ācāryas tu te gatim vaktā.

śrī dattātreyā- viracitāyām avadhūta- gītāyām ātma-saṁvittiyupadeśo nāma dvitīyodhyāyaḥ.

CHAPTER III

I. guṇa-viguṇa-vibhāgo vartate naiva kiñcit rati-virati-vihīnam nirmalam niṣprapaṇam guṇa-viguṇa-vihīnam vyāpakam viśva-rūpaṁ katham aham iha vande vyoma-rūpaṁ śivam vai.

2. śvetādi-varṇa-rahito niyatam śivaś ca kāryam hi kāraṇam idam hi param śivaś ca evam vikalparahito ham alam śivaśca svātmānam ātmani sumitra katham namāmi?

'It is devoid of colours like white and the like. It is self-possessed and holy. It is both the cause and effect of itself. It is distinctionless and stainless. It is the Holy Being. O good friend! How shall I salute the Self with the Self?'

3. nirmūla-mūla-rahito hi sadoditoḥam nirdhūma-dhūma-rahito hi sadoditoḥam nirdipa-dipa-rahito hi sadoditoḥam
 jñānāmṛtaṁ samarasam gaganopamohaṁ.

'I am radically unoriginated and ever risen. Unclouded, no cloud can conceal me. I am ever risen. Unlighted, no light can make me shine for I am ever risen. I am the nectar of knowledge, imbued with harmony, and am like the vault of heaven.'

(The word ahaṁ is used in this verse in two circumstances. (1) sadoditoḥ ahaṁ: In this expression the word ahaṁ is in the masculine gender. (2) jñānāmṛtaṁ samarasam gaganopamohaṁ. In this expression the attributes of ahaṁ are both in neuter gender and in masculine gender. So the circumstance in which this ahaṁ is used is different from the circumstance in which ahaṁ is used in the former case. Further, Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka (1.4.1) says with reference to Ātman the ground of all ahaṁ nāmā abhavat. 'It became the bearer of the name ahaṁ.' This gives the idea that the Truth is Ātman and that is 'I'. Further the same Upaniṣad (1.6.1) says samaṁ . . . brahma . . . sarvāṇi nāmāni bibharti. 'Equipose is Brahman. . . All names it bears.' Ahaṁ is one of these names.

In keeping with these ideas ahaṁ coming at the end of the verse is taken to be a separate attitude of the Truth and it is translated as 'That is I'. The idea contained in this translation is that the knowledge of the truth is the knowledge of 'I'. As it is already noted under the first verse of the Jīvanmukta-Gītā what is commonly called 'I' is not the 'I' presented as Truth. The word 'I' is primarily the name of the Ultimate Truth. Understood thus the truth taught by the last line becomes the reason for the previous statements in the verse. The same is the construction with reference to similar passages.)

4. niṣkāma-kāmaṁ iha nāma kathaṁ vadāmi nissanga-sangaṁ iha nāma kathaṁ vadāmi nissāra-sāra-rahitaṁ ca kathaṁ vadāmi
 jñānāmṛtaṁ samarasam gaganopamohaṁ.

'It is the desireless desire. How shall I name it? It is the unattached attachment. How shall I describe it? It is insubstantial and devoid of a core. What shall I say of it? I am the nectar of knowledge, the harmony of things and like unto the vault of heaven.'

5. advaita-rūpaṁ akhilaṁ katham vadāmi dvaita-svarūpaṁ akhilaṁ hi katham vadāmi nityaṁ tv anityaṁ akhilaṁ hi katham vadāmi
 jñānāmṛtaṁ samarasam gaganopamohaṁ.

'All this is the form of the non-dual reality. How shall I describe it? All this is also divided. How shall I propound it? All this is eternal and evanescent again. What shall I say of it? I am the nectar of knowledge, the harmony of things, and like unto the vault of heaven.'

6. asthūlaṁ hi no nahi kṛśaṁ na gatāgataṁ hi ādyanta-madhyā-rahitaṁ na parāparaṁ hi satyaṁ vadāmi khalu vai paramārtha-tattvaṁ
 jñānāmṛtaṁ samarasam gaganopamohaṁ.

'It is neither thick nor thin. It neither moves nor remains unmoved. It has no beginning, no middle and no end. It is neither the high nor the low. I am indeed speaking the truth about Ultimate Reality. It is the nectar of knowledge, the harmony of things and like unto the vault of heaven.'

7. saṁviddhi sarva-karaṇāṁ nabho-nibhāṁ saṁviddhi sarva-viṣayāś ca nabho-nibhāś ca saṁviddhi caikaṁ amalaṁ na hi bandha-muktaṁ
 jñānāmṛtaṁ samarasam gaganopamohaṁ.

'Know all organs of sense to be (intangible) like the sky. Know all objects of sense to be like the sky. Know the one stainless being who is neither bound nor free. I am the nectar of knowledge, the harmony of things and like unto the vault of heaven.'

8. durbodha bodha-gahano na bhavāmi tāta durlakṣya lakṣya-gahano na bhavāmi tāta āsanna-rūpa-gahano na bhavāmi tāta
 jñānāmṛtaṁ samarasam gaganopamohaṁ.

'I am beyond knowledge and cannot be reached by knowledge. I am invisible and am not the object of sight. I have no form which is accessible. I am the nectar of knowledge, the harmony of things and like unto the vault of heaven.'

9. niskarma-karma-dahano jvalano bhavāmi nirduhkha-duhkha-dahano jvalano bhavāmi nirdeha-deha-dahano jvalano bhavāmi
 jñānāmṛtaṁ samarasam gaganopamohaṁ.

'Though inactive, I am the fire that consumes all action. Though sorrowless, I am the fire that consumes all sorrow. Though thirstless, I am the fire that consumes all thirst. I am the nectar of knowledge, the harmony of things, and like unto the vault of heaven.'

10. niṣpāpa-pāpa-dahano hi hutāśanoḥam nirdharma-dharma-dahano hi hutāśanoḥam nirbandha-bandha-dahano hi hutāśanoḥam
 jñānāmṛtaṁ samarasam gaganopamohaṁ.

'Sinless as I am, I am the sacrificial fire that consumes all sin. Unprescribed I am the sacrificial fire that consumes all prescriptions. Unbound, I am the sacrificial fire that scorches all bondage I am the nectar of knowledge, the harmony of things and like unto the vault of heaven'

11. nirbhāva-bhāvarahito na bhavāmi vatsa niryoga-yoga-rahito na bhavāmi vatsa niścitta-citta-rahito na bhavāmi vatsa
 jñānāmṛtaṁ samarasam gaganopamohaṁ.

'Though unaffected, I am not without affection, My Dear Child! Though unyoked, I am not without a yoke, My Dear Child! Though mindless, I am not without mind, My Dear Child! I am the nectar of knowledge, the harmony of things and like unto the vault of heaven.'

12. nirmoha-moha-padavīta na me vikalpaḥ niṣṣoka-śoka-padavīti na me vikalpaḥ nirlobha-lobha-padavīti na me vikalpaḥ jñānāmṛtaṁ samarsam gaganopamohaṁ.

'I never fancy dupes as hopes I never fancy griefs as joys I never fancy greed as greedlessness I am the nectar of knowledge, the harmony of things and like unto the vault of heaven.'

13. saṁsāra-santati-latā na ca me kadācit saṁtosa-santati-sukhe na ca me kadācit ajnāna-bandhanam idaṁ na ca me kadācit jñānāmṛtam samarasam gaganopamohaṁ.

'The creeper of worldliness has not entwined itself round me. The concatenation of pleasures does not give me happiness. I am not enslaved by ignorance. I am the nectar of knowledge, the harmony of things and like unto the vault of heaven.'

14. saṁsāra-santatir ajo na ca me vikāraḥ santāpa-santati-tamo na ca me vikāraḥ satvaṁ svadharma-janakam na ca me vikāraḥ
 jñānāmṛtaṁ samarasam gaganopamohaṁ.

'The stained train of worldliness leaves me unaffected. The gloom of a perpetual stream of anguish leaves me unaffected. I stand unaffected again by a virtue causing one to do his prescribed duties. I am the nectar of knowledge, the harmony of things and like unto the vault of heaven.'

15. santāpa-duḥkha-janako na vidhiḥ kadācit santāpa-yoga-janitam na manaḥ kadācit yasmād ahaṅkṛtir iyaṁ na ca me kadācit
 jñānāmṛtaṁ samarasam gaganopamohaṁ.

'The fate that ordains anguish and pain is not for me; Not for me the mind tormented by tortuous meditation. Not for me that which induces egotism. I am the nectar of knowledge, the harmony of things and like unto the vault of heaven.'

16. niṣkaṁpa-kaṁpa-nidhanaṁ na vikalpa-kalpaṁ svapna-prabodha-nidhanaṁ na hitāhitam hi nissāra-sāra-nidhanaṁ na carācaram hi
 jñānāmṛtaṁ samarasam gaganopamohaṁ.

'It is untrembling and makes all trembling cease. There is neither slumber nor wakefulness for it. Nothing that is propitious or unpropitious, insubstantial; it melts away all substance. Nothing moves nor remains unmoved for it. It is the nectar of knowledge, the harmony of things and like unto the vault of heaven.'

17. no vedya-vedakam idaṁ na ca hetu-tarkyam vācāmagocaram idaṁ na mano na buddhiḥ evaṁ katham hi bhavataḥ kathayāmi tattvaṁ
 jñānāmṛtaṁ samarasam gaganopamohaṁ.

'It is neither the knower nor the known; It is not cause to be investigated by logic; it is beyond the ken of speech, mind and intellect.

How shall I relate this reality to you? I am the nectar of knowledge, the harmony of things, and like unto the vault of heaven.'

18. nirbhinna-bhinna-rahitam paramārtha-tattvaṁ antar bahir na hi katham paramārtha-tattvaṁ prāk sambhavaṁ na ca rataṁ na hi vastu kimcit jñānāmṛtaṁ samarasam gaganopamoham.

'The Ultimate Reality is impartite and remains partless; It has neither an inner nor an outer for it. It is neither produced in the past nor does it delight in producing. It is not a thing among things. I am the nectar of knowledge, the harmony of things, and like unto the vault of heaven.

- 19 rāgādi-doṣa-rahitaṁ tv aham eva tattvaṁ daivādi-dosa-rahitaṁ tv aham eva tattvaṁ saṁsāra-śoka-rahitaṁ tv aham eva tattvaṁ jñānāmṛtaṁ samarasam gaganopamoham.

'I am the Reality free from the blemish of passion and the like I am the Reality, free from the flaw of fate. I am the Reality free from the grief of a groaning world. I am the nectar of knowledge, the harmony of things, like unto the vault of heaven.'

20. Sthāna-trayaṁ yadi ca neti katham turīyaṁ?
 kāla-trayaṁ yadi ca neti katham diśaś ca?
 śāntaṁ padaṁ hi paramaṁ paramārtha-tattvaṁ
 jñānāmṛtaṁ samarasam gaganopamoham.

'How can there be a fourth state when there are not the three? How can there be a direction without the three-fold division of time? The Ultimate Reality is the state of the Highest Repose. I am the nectar of knowledge, the harmony of things and like unto the vault of heaven.'

21. dirgho laghuh punar itiha na me vibhāgaḥ vistāra sankataṁ itiha na me vibhāgaḥ konaṁ hi vartulaṁ itiha na me vibhāgaḥ jñānāmṛtaṁ samarasam gaganopamoham.

'Distinctions of long or short, broad or narrow are not for me; distinctions of angle and circle have no relevance for me; I am the nectar of knowledge, the harmony of things and like unto the vault of heaven.'

22. mātā pitādi tanayādi na me kadācit jātaṁ mṛtaṁ na ca mano na ca me kadācit nirvyākulaṁ sthiraṁ idaṁ paramārtha-tattvaṁ
 jñānāmṛtaṁ samarasam gaganopamohaṁ.

'I have neither mother nor father nor offspring; there is neither birth nor death for me; nor a mind. This Ultimate Reality is unagitated and firm. I am the nectar of knowledge, the harmony of things, and like unto the vault of heaven.'

23. suddhaṁ viśuddhaṁ avicāraṁ ananta-rūpaṁ nirlepa-lepaṁ avicāraṁ ananta-rūpaṁ niṣkhaṇḍa-khaṇḍaṁ avicāraṁ ananta-rūpaṁ
 jñānāmṛtaṁ samarasam gaganopamohaṁ.

'It is the purest of pure things, beyond reflection; having infinite forms. It is the unadhering but that to which everything adheres; beyond reflection, having infinite forms. It is undivided but the principle of division itself; beyond reflection and having infinite forms. I am the nectar of knowledge, the harmony of things, and like unto the vault of heaven.'

24. brahmādayaḥ sura-gaṇāḥ kathaṁ atra santi svargādayo vasatayaḥ kathaṁ atra santi yady ekarūpaṁ amalāṁ paramārtha-tattvaṁ
 jñānāmṛtaṁ samarasam gaganopamohaṁ.

'How do Brahmā and the hosts of gods exist there? Whence can there be heaven and the like? The Ultimate Reality is all of a piece and undefective. I am the nectar of knowledge, the harmony of things and like unto the vault of heaven.'

25. nirneti neti vimalohi kathaṁ vadāmi niśśeṣa śeṣa vimalohi kathaṁ vadāmi nirliṅga liṅga vimalohi kathaṁ vadāmi
 jñānāmṛtaṁ samarasam gaganopamohaṁ.

'How can I aver of this spotless one that it is not this nor that? How can I aver of this spotless one that it is the residue of a residueless entity? How can I aver of this spotless one that it is of a sex when it is the sexless one? I am the nectar of knowledge, the harmony of things and like unto the vault of heaven.'

26. niskarma-karma paramam satatam karomi nissāṅga-saṅga-rahitam paramam vinodam nirdeha-deha-rahitam satatam vinodam jñānāmṛtam samarasam gaganopamoham.

'Though inactive, I am ever engaged in the highest activity. Though free from all attachment I drive away all tedium, though bodiless, I am ever in delight. I am the nectar of knowledge, the harmony of things and like unto the vault of heaven '

27. mājyā-prapaṇca-racanā na ca me vikārah kauṭilya-ḍambha-racanā na ca me vikārah satyānṛteti-racanā na ca me vikārah jñānāmṛtam samarasam gaganopamoham.

'The wonderful structure of the world does not cause any change in me. Its crookedness and deceit have no effect on me Truth and lying produce no disturbance in me. I am the nectar of knowledge, the harmony of things and like unto the vault of heaven.'

28. sandhyādi-kāla-rahitam na ca me vīyogah(o) hy antah-prabodha-rahitam badhiro na mūkah evam vikalpa-rahitam na ca bhāva-śuddham
jñānāmṛtam samarasam gaganopamoham

'To that there is no eventide or anything like it, no parting from anything, there is no awakening from within to it; there is neither deaf nor dumb for it; there is neither purity of disposition nor its destruction from it, I am the nectar of wisdom, the harmony of things and like unto the vault of heaven '

29. nīmātha-nātha-rahitam hi nirākulam vai niścitta-citta-vigatam hi nirākulam vai saṁviddhi sarva-vigatam hi nirākulam vai jñānāmṛtam samarasam gaganopamoham.

'It has no master and is free from perplexity; It has no mind and is free from perplexity, understand it to be unfettered by anything; it is free from perplexity, I am the nectar of wisdom, the harmony of things and like unto the vault of heaven.'

30. kāntāra-mandiram idam hi katham vadāmi saṁsiddha-saṁśayaṁ idam hi katham vadāmi evam nīrantara-samam hi nirākulam vai jñānāmṛtam samarasam gaganopamoham.

'How indeed can I aver this to be a mansion in the wilderness? How indeed can I aver that it is all a substantiated uncertainty? It is ever in equilibrium and remains undisturbed; I am the nectar of wisdom, the harmony of things and like unto the vault of heaven.'

31. nirjīva-jīva-rahitaṁ satataṁ vibhāti nirbīja-bīja-rahitaṁ satataṁ vibhāti nirvāna-bandha-rahitaṁ satataṁ vibhāti jñānāmṛtaṁ samarasaṁ gaganopamohaṁ.

'It is lifeless and though devoid of life it shines ever and anon. It is seedless and though seedless it flourishes ever and anon. It is liberated and though unfettered it shines ever and anon. I am the nectar of wisdom, the harmony of things and like unto the vault of heaven.'

32. saṁbhūti-varjitaṁ idaṁ satataṁ vibhāti saṁsāra-varjitaṁ idaṁ satataṁ vibhāti saṁhāra-varjitaṁ idaṁ satataṁ vibhāti jñānāmṛtaṁ samarasaṁ gaganopamohaṁ.

'It is free from origination and shines ever and anon. It is free from mundane existence and shines ever and anon. It is free from destruction and shines ever and anon. I am the nectar of wisdom, the harmony of things and like unto the vault of heaven.'

33. ullekhamātraṁ api te na ca nāma-rūpaṁ nirbhinna-bhinnaṁ api te na hi vastu kiñcit nirlajja-mānasa karoṣi kathaṁ viśādaṁ jñānāmṛtaṁ samarasaṁ gaganopamohaṁ.

'You can only be mentioned but you have neither name nor form. Your are unseparated and there is nothing that can exist apart from you. O unabashed mind! Why dost thou get wearied? I am the nectar of wisdom, the harmony of things and like unto the vault of heaven.'

34. kiṁ nāma roḍiṣi sakhe na jarā na mṛtyuḥ kiṁ nāma roḍiṣi sakhe na ca janma-duḥkhaṁ kiṁ nāma roḍiṣi sakhe na ca te vikāraḥ jñānāmṛtaṁ samarasaṁ gaganopamohaṁ.

'Why moanest thou, friend; there is neither decrepitude nor death for you? Why moanest thou, friend, there is no travail of birth for you? Why moanest thou, friend, there is no perversion in you? I am the nectar of wisdom, the harmony of things and like unto the vault of heaven.'

- 35 kīṁ nāma roḍiśi sakhe na ca te svarūpaṁ kīṁ nāma roḍiśi sakhe na ca te virūpaṁ kīṁ nāma roḍiśi sakhe na ca te vayāṁsi
 jñānāmṛtaṁ samarasam gaganopamohaṁ.

'Why moanest thou, friend; there is no figurement nor disfigurement for you? Why moanest thou, friend; growing age is not for you? I am the nectar of wisdom, the harmony of things and like unto the vault of heaven.'

36. kim nāma roḍiśi sakhe na ca te vayāṁsi kim nāma roḍiśi sakhe na ca te manāṁsi kīṁ nāma roḍiśi sakhe na tavendriyāṁ
 jñānāmṛtaṁ samarasam gaganopamohaṁ.

'Why moanest thou, friend, growing age is not for you? Why moanest thou, friend, mind and the senses are not for you? I am the nectar of wisdom, the harmony of things and like unto the vault of heaven.'

37. kim nāma roḍiśi sakhe na ca te sti kāmah kīṁ nāma roḍiśi sakhe na ca te pralobhah kīṁ nāma roḍiśi sakhe na ca te vimohah
 jñānāmṛtaṁ samarasam gaganopamohaṁ.

'Why moanest thou, friend; lusts do not assail you; greed does not afflict you? Infatuation does not move you. I am the nectar of wisdom, the harmony of things and like into the vault of heaven '

38. aiśvaryaṁ icchasi kathaṁ na ca te dhanāni aiśvaryaṁ icchasi katham na ca te hi patnī aiśvaryaṁ icchasi kathaṁ na ca te mametī
 jñānāmṛtaṁ samarasam gaganopamohaṁ.

'Wealth is not for you; so how can you hanker after it? Thou hast no wife; so how can you hanker after wealth? Thou hast nothing that you wish to own as thine; So how can you hanker after wealth? I am the nectar of wisdom, the harmony of things and like unto the vault of heaven.'

- 39 Linga- prapanca--januṣi na ca te na me ca nirlajja-mānasaṁ idaṁ ca vibhāti bhinnam nirbheda-bheda-rahitaṁ na ca te na me ca
 jñānāmṛtaṁ samarasam gaganopamohaṁ.

'The false world is neither for you nor for me; the immodest mind fancies itself as different from it; the undifferentiated is not for you or for me. I am the nectar of wisdom, the harmony of things and like unto the vault of heaven.'

40. novāṇumātram api te hi virāga-rūpaṁ novāṇumātram api te hi sarāga-rūpaṁ novāṇumātram api te hi sakāma-rūpaṁ
jñānāmṛtaṁ samarasam gaganopamohaṁ.

'Thou hast not even a moiety of contradictory qualities or identical qualities; nor have you any form born of desire; I am the nectar of wisdom, the harmony of things and like unto the vault of heaven.'

41. dhyātā na te hi hṛdaye na ca te samādhiḥ dhyānām na te hi hṛdaye na bahiḥ pradeśaḥ dhyāyām na ceti hṛdaye na hi vastu-kālo
jñānāmṛtaṁ samarasam gaganopamohaṁ.

'There is no object to be meditated upon in your heart nor perfect absorption in it; there is no inner meditation in your heart nor any external space that lies outside it; there is no object of meditation in the heart and nothing that transpires in time. I am the nectar of wisdom, the harmony of things and like unto the vault of heaven.'

42. yat sārabhūtaṁ akhilaṁ kathitaṁ mayā te na tvaṁ na me na mahato na guruḥ na śiṣyaḥ svacchanda-rūpa-sahajaṁ paramārtha-tattvaṁ
jñānāmṛtaṁ samarasam gaganopamohaṁ.

'You have been told by me all that constitutes the core of truth; nothing there is which is big, neither teacher nor the taught. The Ultimate Reality is inherently spontaneous. I am the nectar of wisdom, the harmony of things and like unto the vault of heaven.'

43. kathaṁ iha paramārthaṁ tattvaṁ ānanda-rūpaṁ kathaṁ iha paramārthaṁ naivaṁ ānanda-rūpaṁ kathaṁ iha paramārthaṁ jñāna-vijnāna-rūpaṁ yadi paraṁ ahaṁ ekaṁ vartate vyoma-rūpaṁ.

'How can Ultimate Reality be of the nature of bliss? How can Ultimate Reality be of the nature of knowledge or transcendental knowledge whilst the highest 'Me' exists extended like space?

- 44 dahana-pavana-hīnam viddhu vijnānam ekam.
 avanī-jala-vihīnam viddhi vijnāna-rūpam sama-gamana-vihīnam viddhi vijnānam ekam gaganam iva viśālam viddhi vijnānam ekam.

'It neither burns like fire nor blows like air—know that to be the one transcendental knowledge. It is not land or the sea. Know that to be the one transcendental knowledge, it does not proceed with anything else, know that to be transcendental knowledge. It is like space. Know that to be transcendental knowledge.'

45. na śūnya-rūpam na viśūnya-rūpam na śuddha-rūpam na viśuddha-rūpam rūpam virūpam na bhavāmi kimcit svarūpa-rūpam paramārtha tattvam.

'It is neither a void nor a plenum; it is neither pure nor impure; it is neither beautiful nor ugly. Ultimate Reality is only like itself'

- 46 munca munca hī saṁsāram tyāgam munca hī sarvathā tyāgātyāga-viṣam śuddham amrtam sahaJam dhruvam.

'Abandon ye worldliness; abandon ye renunciation, renouncing or non-renouncing is irrelevant to truth which is immortal, inherent and certain.'

iti śrī dattātreyā-vīracitāyām avadhūta-gītāyām
 ātma-samvitty-upadeśo nāma trtīyodhyāyah

'Thus is the third chapter entitled "The Instruction of Wisdom pertaining to the Truth of Self" in the Avadhūta-Gītā composed by Śrī Dattātreyā'

CHAPTER IV

Śrī Dattātreyā says:—

- I. nāvāhanam naiva visarjanam vā puspāni patrāni katham bhavanti dhyānāni mantrāni katham bhavanti samāsamam caiva śivārcanam ca.

'Whence can there be invocation or laying down? or worship with flowers or leaves? Wherefore the relevance of meditation and muttering of hymns? Whereby can there be worship of the same by the same, the worship of an external deity?'

2. na kevalam bandha-vibandha-mukto na kevalam śuddha-viśuddha-muktaḥ na kevalam yoga-viyoga-muktaḥ sa vai vimukto gaganopamohaṁ.

‘It is not only free from bondage and release. It is not only free from the pure and the impure. It is not only free from discipline and non-discipline. But it is freedom itself. It is space-like. That is “I”.’

3. sanjāyate sarvaṁ idaṁ hi tathyaṁ sanjāyate sarvaṁ idaṁ vitathyaṁ evaṁ vikalpo mama naiva jātaḥ svarūpa-nirvāṇaṁ anāmayohaṁ.

‘“This is born, hence real; this is born and hence is unreal”. Such ideas are foreign to me. I am of the nature of bliss and am defectless.’

4. na sāñjanaṁ caiva nirañjanaṁ vā na cāntaraṁ vāpi nirañtaraṁ vā antarvibhinnaṁ na hi me vibhāti
 svarūpa-nirvāṇaṁ anāmayohaṁ.

‘Neither that which has defects, nor that which has no defects; neither (that which has) interval nor that which has no interval, nor that which is in itself broken presents itself to me. I am of the nature of bliss and am defectless.’

5. abodha-bodho mama naiva jāto bodha-svarūpaṁ mama naiva jātaṁ nirbodha-bodhaṁ ca kathaṁ vadāmi
 svarūpa-nirvāṇaṁ anāmayohaṁ.

‘The knowledge that presupposes non-knowledge is never produced in me. The disposition of being knowledge is never produced in me. How can I expound knowledge in its relation to non-knowledge? I am of the nature of bliss and am defectless.’

6. na dharma-yukto na ca pāpa-yukto na bandha yukto na ca mokṣa-yuktaḥ yuktaṁ tv ayuktaṁ na ca me vibhāti
 svarūpa-nirvāṇaṁ anāmayohaṁ.

‘I am neither meritorious nor sinful. I am neither bound nor free. There is nothing proper or improper for me. I am of the nature of the bliss and am defectless.’

7. parāparam vā na ca me kadācit madhyastha-bhāvo hi na cāri-mitraṁ hitāhitam cāpi katham vadāmi
svarūpa-nirvānam anāmayoham.

'I have no sense of superior or inferior or middling. I have no enemies or friends. How can I speak of good and evil? I am of the nature of bliss and am defectless.'

8. nopāsako naivam upāsyarūpam na copadeśo na ca me kriyā ca samvit-svarūpam ca katham vadāmi
svarūpa-nirvānam anāmayoham.

'Neither the worshipper nor that which is worshipped, neither instruction nor any ritual, is relevant to me. The Truth is of the nature of knowledge. How can I expound It? I am of the nature of bliss and am defectless.'

9. no vyāpakam vyāpyam ihāsti kimcit no cālayam vāpi nirālayam vā aśūnya-sūnyam ca katham vadāmi
svarūpa-nirvānam anāmayoham.

'There is in this circumstance, nothing pervading, nothing less pervading. There is no place of rest, not even the absence of such place. The Truth is something as well as nothing. How can I expound It? I am of the nature of bliss and am defectless.'

10. na grāhako grāhyakam eva kimcit na kāranam vā mama naiva kāryam acintya-cintyam ca katham vadāmi
svarūpa-nirvānam anāmayoham.

'To me there is neither the apprehender nor the apprehended; neither cause nor effect; neither thinkable nor unthinkable can be asserted of me. I am of the nature of bliss and am defectless.'

11. na bhedakam vāpi na caiva bhedyam na vedakam mama naiva vedyam gatāgataṁ tāta katham vadāmi
svarūpa-nirvānam anāmayoham.

'How can I assert of this that it is the divider or the divided, the knower or the known, the thing which goes or comes? I am of the nature of bliss and defectless.'

12. na cāsti deho na ca me videho buddhir mano me na hi cendriyāṇi rāgo virāgaś ca katham vadāmi
 svarūpa-nirvāṇam anāmayoham.

‘I have no body nor am I bodiless. I cannot be said to have intellect, mind or the senses. I have neither passion nor dispassion. I am of the nature of bliss and am defectless.’

13. ullekha-mātram na hi bhinnam uccaiḥ ullekha-mātram na tirohitam vai samāsamam mitra katham vadāmi
 svarūpa-nirvāṇam anāmayoham.

‘It can just be mentioned and not different from what is supreme. It can just be mentioned and yet is not concealed. How can I speak of that, O Friend! which is the same in all things and yet not the same? I am of the nature of bliss and am defectless.’

14. jitendriyoham tv ajitendriyo vā na saṁyamo me niyamo na jātaḥ jayājayaṁ mitra katham vadāmi
 svarūpa-nirvāṇam anāmayoham.

‘I have and I have not subdued the senses. I have no restraint and no discipline. Friend! How can I speak of victory or failure? I am of the nature of bliss and am defectless.’

15. amūrta-mūrtiḥ na ca me kadācit ādy-anta-madhyam na ca me kadācit balābalaṁ mitra katham vadāmi
 svarūpa-nirvāṇam anāmayoham.

‘Form and formlessness are not for me. Beginning, middle and end are not for me. How can I speak of that, O Friend! as strong or weak? I am of the nature of bliss and am defectless.’

16. mṛtāmṛtam vāpi viśāviṣam ca sanjāyate tāta na me kadācit aśuddha-śuddham ca katham vadāmi
 svarūpa-nirvāṇam anāmayoham.

‘To me there is neither death nor immortality, poison or nectar. How can I speak of that as pure or impure even? I am of the nature of bliss and am defectless.’

- 17 svapnah-prabodho na ca yoga-mudrā naktam divā vāpi na me kadācit aturya-turyam ca katham vadāmi
svarūpa-nirvānam anāmayoham.

'To me there is neither sleep nor awakening, nor the pose of yoga; there is neither night nor day. How can I speak of that in terms of the fourth state or the non-fourth state? I am of the nature of bliss and am defectless.'

18. samviddhi mam sarva-visarva-muktam māyā-vimāyā na ca me kadācit sandhyādikam karma katham vadāmi
svarūpa-nirvānam anāmayoham.

'Know me as free from everything and nothing, illusion or non-illusion. How can I speak of it in terms of twilight rite? I am of the nature of bliss and am defectless.'

- 19 samviddhi mām sarva-samādhi-yuktam samviddhi mām laksya-vilaksya-muktam yogam viyogam ca katham vadāmi
svarūpa-nirvānam anāmayoham.

'Understand me as imbued with the highest state of absorption, as incapable of being defined or undefined. How can I speak of that as that which unifies or divides? I am of the nature of bliss and am defectless.'

20. mūrkhopi nāham na ca paṇḍitoham maunam vimaunam na ca me kadācit tarkam vitarkam ca katham vadāmi
svarūpa-nirvānam anāmayoham.

'I am neither ignorant nor learned To me there is neither silence nor speech How can I speak of that as logical or illogical? I am of the nature of bliss and am defectless.'

21. pitā ca mātā ca kulam na jātiḥ janmādi mṛtyur na ca me kadācit sneham vimoham ca katham vadāmi
svarūpa-nirvānam anāmayoham.

'To me there is neither father nor mother, neither family nor caste, neither birth nor death. How can I speak of that as attached or unattached? I am of the nature of bliss and am defectless.'

22. astam̐ gato naiva sadodito ham̐ tejo-vitejo na ca me kadācit
 sandhyādikam̐ karma katham̐ vadāmi
 svarūpa-nirvāṇam̐ anāmayoham̐.

‘To me there is no rising or setting, neither light nor darkness. How can I speak of that in terms of twilight rite? I am of the nature of bliss and am defectless.’

23. asaṁśayam̐ viddhi nirākulam̐ mām̐ asaṁśayam̐ viddhi nīrantaram̐ mām̐ asaṁśayam̐ viddhi nīranjanam̐ mām̐
 svarūpa-nirvāṇam̐ anāmayoham̐.

‘Know me without doubt as unperplexed, everlasting, and unsmeared. I am of the nature of bliss and am defectless.’

24. dhyānāni sarvāni parityajanti śubhāśubham̐ karma parityajanti tyāgāmṛtam̐ tāta pibanti dhīrāḥ
 svarūpa-nirvāṇam̐ anāmayoham̐.

‘The strong-minded ones eschew all religious contemplation and forswear themselves of all auspicious and unauspicious acts. They quaff the nectar of renunciation. I am of the nature of bliss and am defectless.’

25. vindati vindati na hi na hi yatra chando lakṣaṇam̐ na hi nahi tatra
 samarasa-magno bhāvita-pūtaḥ
 pralapati tattvam̐ param̐ avadhūtaḥ.

‘Where logical understanding is of no avail, there rhetorical assertion is also of no avail. The great avadhūta immersed in bliss and filled with inspiration proclaims the truth.’

iti śrī dattātreyā-vīracitāyām̐ avadhūta-gītāyām̐ svāmi-kārtika-saṁvāde svātma-saṁvittiyupadeśe svarūpa-nirṇayo nāma caturthodhyāyaḥ.

‘Thus is the fourth chapter entitled “Definition of the Essence” in the “Instruction of Wisdom connected with one’s own self” in the course of the discussion between Svāmi and Kārtika in the Avadhūta-Gītā composed by Śrī Dattātreyā.

CHAPTER V

Thus spake Śrī Dattātreyā-

1. aum iti gaditam gagana-samam tanna parāpara-sāra-vicāra iti avilāsa-vilāsa-nirākaraṇam katham aksara-bindu-samuccaranam

'It is named as "Aum" and is like the void of space. The Beyond and the After, Substance or Reflection have no meaning here. The unmanifest and the manifest are eschewable terms. While it is so, how can it be expressed in a syllable or a dot?'

2. iti tat tvam asi-prabhrti-śrutibhih pratipāditam ātmani tattvam asi tvam upādhi-vivarjita-sarva-samam kim u rodiśi mānasi sarva-samam.

'The scriptures proclaim "That art Thou". You are that in your self. You are free from all limiting conditions and the principle of Identity in all. Why lamentest thou then when All is One?'

3. atha ūrdhva-vivarjita-sarva-samam bahirantara-varjita-sarva-samam yadicaikavivarjita sarva-samam.
kim u rodiśi mānasi sarva-samam.

'It is the self-same identity than which there is nothing higher, nor is there anything outer or inner for it, nor can it be spoken of as numerically one. It is the self-same identity. Why lamentest thou then when All is One?'

4. nahi kalpita-kalpa-vicāra iti nahu kārana-kārya-vicāra iti pada-sandhi-vivarjita-sarva-samam
kim u rodiśi mānasi sarva-samam.

'It does not admit of a discussion of conceivability or concept, of cause or effect of term and copula. It is the self-same identity. Why lamentest thou then when All is one?'

5. nahi bodha-vibodha-samādhir iti nahi deśa-videśa-samādhir iti nahu kāla-vikāla-samādhir iti
kim u rodiśi mānasi sarva-samam.

'There is nothing here of meditation which is taught or not taught, which is in this or the other place, at this or some other time. Why lamentest thou then when All is one?'

6. nahi kumbha-nabho nahi kumbha iti na hi jīva-vapuḥ na hi jīva iti na hi kāraṇa-kārya-vibhāga iti kiṁ u rodiṣi mānasi sarva-samaṁ.

'It is the space within the jar or the jar itself, it is not the body embodying the soul nor even the soul itself. It is not the cause nor the action. Why lamentest thou then when All is one?'

7. iha sarva-nirantara-mokṣa-padam laghu-dīrgha-vicāra-vihīna iti na hi vartula-koṇa-vibhāga iti
 kiṁ u rodiṣi mānasi sarva-samaṁ.

'Herein is all the eternal state of release. It does not lend itself to short or long discussion. Distinctions of circularity and triangularity do not apply to it. Why lamentest thou then when All is one?'

8. iha śūnya-viśūnya-vihīna iti iha śuddha-viśuddha-vihīna iti iha sarva-visarva-vihīna iti
 kiṁ u rodiṣi mānasi sarva-samaṁ.

'Void or full are meaningless here; so are pure and impure, all and none, why lamentest thou then when All is one?'

9. nahi bhinna-vibhinna-vicāra iti bahir-antara-sandhi-vicāra iti ari-mitra-vivarjita-sarva-samaṁ
 kiṁ u rodiṣi mānasi sarva-samaṁ.

'The discussion of difference or non-difference of the outer, the inner, and the between, of foe or friend is eschewed here. It is the self-same identity. Why lamentest thou then when All is one?'

10. na hi śiṣya-viśiṣya-svarūpa iti na carācara-bheda-vicāra iti
 iha sarva-nirantara-mokṣa-padam
 kiṁ u rodiṣi mānasi sarva-samaṁ.

'No discussion is here of who is the disciple and who the non-disciple; which is the moving and which the non-moving. Here is the state of liberation entire and ever lasting Why lamentest thou then when All is one?’

11. nanu rūpa-virūpa-vihīna iti nanu bhīna-vibhīna-vihīna iti nanu sarga-visarga-vihīna iti
 kim u rodasi mānasi sarva-samam.

‘Is not that free from form or formlessness? Is not that free from the divided and the undivided? Is not that free from evolution or involution? Why lamentest thou then when All is one?’

12. na gunāguṇa-pāśa-nibandha iti mṛta-jīvana-karma-karomi katham iti śuddha-niranjana-sarva-samam
 kim u rodasi mānasi sarva-samam.

There is no bondage here to the rope of the Gaṇas. When earthly life has ceased whence is the question of the doer and the deed? It is the self-same identity pure and simple. Why lamentest thou then when All is one?’

13. iha bhāva-vibhāva-vihīna iti iha kāma-vikāma-vihīna iti iha bodhatamam khalu mokṣa-samam kim u rodasi mānsasi sarva-samam.

‘Existence or non-existence, desire or desirelessness, have no meaning here. This indeed is the highest teachable truth like unto liberation itself. Why lamentest thou then when All is one?’

14. iha tattva-nirantara-tattvam iti na hi sandhi-visandhi-vihīna iti yadi sarva-vivarjita-sarva-samam
 kim u rodiṣi mānasi sarva-samam.

‘Here is the truth and the eternal truth. It has neither conjunction and disjunction. It is the self-same Identity distinguished from all else. Why lamentest thou then when All is one?’

15. aniketa-kuṭi-parivāra-samam iha saṅga-visaṅga-vihīna-param iha bodha-vibodha-vihīna-param
 kim u rodiṣi mānasi sarva-samam.

‘It has no particular locus, nor house to live in, nor retinue. It is all itself. It is neither related nor unrelated. It is neither taught nor untaught. Why lamentest thou then when All is one?’

16. avikāra-vikāraṁ asatyam iti avilakṣya-vilakṣyam asatyam iti yadi kevalam ātmani satyam iti
 kim u rodiṣi mānasi sarva-samam.

‘To speak of it as formless or out of proper form is to speak an untruth. To say of it as purposeless or purposeful is to utter an untruth. The truth is that it is the sole reality. Why lamentest thou then when All is one?’

17. iha sarva tamam khalu jīva iti iha sarva-nirantara-jīva iti iha kevala-niṣcala-jīva iti
 kim u rodiṣi mānasi sarva-samam.

‘Herein is the Absolute Self of all. Here is the ever-lasting Self of all. Here is the only unchanging Self of all. Why lamentest thou then when All is one?’

18. aviveka-vivekaṁ abodha iti avikalpa-vikalpaṁ abodha iti yadi caikanirantara-bodha iti
 kim u rodiṣi mānasi sarva-samam.

‘It is discrimination which is beyond specification. It is beyond knowledge. For this reason, it is an idea which is beyond imagination. It is beyond knowledge. Why lamentest thou then when All is one?’

19. na hi mokṣa-padam nahi bandha-padam na hi puṇya-padam nahi pāpa-padam na hi pūrṇa-padam nahi rikta-padam
 kim u rodiṣi mānasi sarva-samam.

‘It is neither the state of freedom nor of bondage. It is neither the state of merit nor of demerit. It is neither the state of fullness nor of privation. Why lamentest thou then when All is one?’

20. yadi varṇa-vivarṇa-vihīna-samam yadi kāraṇa-kārya-vihīna-samam yadi bheda-vibheda-vihīna-samam
 kim u rodiṣi mānasi sarva-samam.

'If the Identical is devoid of distinctions of colour, of cause and effect, of difference and indifference, why lamentest thou then when All is one?'

21. iha sarva-nirantara-sarva-cite iha kevala-niścāla-sarva-cite dvīpadādi-vivarjita-sarva-cite kim u roḍiṣi mānaṣi sarva-samam.

'For the sake of this spirit which is all and partless, for the sake of this spirit which is by itself and absolutely all-enduring, for the sake of (this) spirit which is beyond the reach of the bipeds and the like, why lamentest thou then when All is one?'

22. atī sarva-nirantara-sarva-gatam atī-nirmala-niścāla-sarva-gatam dina-rātri-vivarjita-sarva-gatam
 kim u roḍiṣi mānaṣi sarva-samam.

'It is beyond All and yet the seamless All, pervades all; untainted and unmoved it moves in All; to it there is neither the break of day nor fall of night, that which has entered into all things. Why lamentest thou then when All is one?'

23. na hi bandha-vibandha-samāgamanam na hi yoga-viyoga-samāgamanam na hi tarka-vitarka-samāgamanam
 kim u roḍiṣi mānaṣi sarva-samam.

'Bondage and freedom can never be reconciled. Discipline and no discipline can never be reconciled. Reason and no reason can never be reconciled. Why lamentest thou then when All is one?'

24. iha kāla-vikāla-nirākaranam aṇu-mātra kṛṣṇa-nirākaranam na hi kevala-satya-nirākaranam
 kim u roḍiṣi mānaṣi sarva-samam.

'The question of proper and improper times is irrelevant to It. Imperfect illumination is irrelevant to It. But pure Truth is indeed never inconsistent with it. Why lamentest thou then when All is one?'

25. iha deha-vidēha-vihīna iti nanu svapna-suṣuptī-vihīna-param

abhidhāna vidhāna-vihīna-param
kiṃ u rodiṣi mānasi sarva-samam.

'It cannot be said to be embodied or disembodied, or transcendent of dream or dreamless sleep. It is the highest, incapable of being fixed in a name. Why lamentest thou then when All is one?'

26. gaganopama-śuddha-viśāla-samam api sarva-vivarjita-sarva-samam gata-sāra-visāra-vikāra-samam
kiṃ u rodiṣi mānasi sarva-samam.

'It is untainted and extended like space albeit distinct from all and identical with all. It is identical in its pervasion in the essential, unessential and the deformed. Why lamentest thou then when All is one?'

27. iha dharma-vidharma-virāga taram iha vastu-vivastu-virāga taram iha kāma-vikāma-virāga taram
kiṃ u rodiṣi mānasi sarva-samam.

'Herein are transcended duty, non-duty and detachment. Herein are transcended entity, non-entity and non-attachment. Herein are transcended desire, non-desire and non-attachment. Why lamentest thou then when All is one?'

28. sukha-duḥkha-vivarjita-sarva-samam.
iha śoka-viśoka-vihīna-param
guru-śiṣya-vivarjita-tattva-param
kiṃ u rodiṣi mānasi sarva-samam.

'It is the self-same identity untouched by differences of happiness or misery, grief or joy, master and disciple. It is the supreme truth. Why lamentest thou then when All is one?'

29. na kilāṅkura-sāra-visāra iti na calācala sāmya-visāmyam iti avicāra-vicāra-vihīnam iti
kiṃ u rodiṣi mānasi sarva-samam.

'It is not indeed a growth, essence or non-essence. For this reason It has not similarity or dissimilarity to that which moves and that which does not move. For this reason It is not subject to enquiry and non-enquiry. Why lamentest thou then when All is one?'

30. iha sāra-samuccaya-sāraṁ iti kathitaṁ nijabhāva-vibheda iti viṣaye karanatvam asatyam iti
kim u rodiṣi mānasi sarva-samam

'Here is the quintessence of all essences. Yet it cannot be said to have a distinct nature of its own. It has no object out of itself for it to apprehend. Why lamentest thou then when All is one?'

31. bahudhā śrutayaḥ pravadanti yato viyadādir idaṁ mrga-toya-samam yadi caikanirantara-sarva-samam
kim u rodiṣi mānasi sarva-samam.

'The scriptures proclaim in diverse fashion that the spread-out world is like a mirage. If the Truth is the self-same seamless reality, why lamentest thou then when All is one?'

- 32 vindati vindati na hi na hi yatra
chando-lakṣanaṁ na hi na hi tatra
samarasa-magno bhāvita-pūtaḥ
pralapati tattvam param avadhūtaḥ.

'Where there is nothing to be apprehended by logical intellect, there is nothing to be asserted in rhetorical speech. Immersed in the ecstasy of union and inwardly inspired the Avadhūta proclaims the highest truth.'

- 33 iti śrī dattātreyā-viracitāyām avadhūta-gītāyam svāmi-kārtika-saṁvade ātma-saṁvittiyupadeśe sama-dṛṣṭi-kathanam nāma pancamodhyāyaḥ.

'Thus is the fifth chapter entitled "The Exposition of the Insight into Peace" in the course of Instruction of the Illumination of Self in the course of the discourse between Svāmi and Kārtika in the Avadhūta-Gītā composed by Śrī Dattātreyā.'

CHAPTER VI

Thus spake Śrī Dattātreyā:

1. bahudhā śrutayaḥ pravadanti vayam
viyadādir idaṁ mrga-toya samam
yadi caika-nirantara-sarva-śivam upameyam atho hy upamā ca katham?

'The scriptures proclaim in diverse manner that we the individual selves and the spread out world are like a mirage. If Reality be one, continuous, all-pervading, and all-holy, with what can it be compared and what comparison would be apt?'

2. avibhakti-vibhakti-vihīna-param
 nanu kārya-vikārya vihīna-param
 yadi caika-nirantara-sarva-śivam
 yajanam ca katham tapanam ca katham.

'It is the highest that transcends the distinction of the divided and the undivided, of what can be done and what should not be done. If Reality be one, continuous, all-pervading and all-holy, where is then the sense of worshipping it and undergoing austerity for its sake?'

3. mana eva nirantara-sarva-gatam hy aviśāla-viśāla-vihīna-param mana eva nirantara-sarva-śivam manasāpi katham vacasā ca katham.

'Mind alone is capable of penetrating everywhere. To the highest there is nothing that is narrow or wide. Mind alone is capable of all good. How by mind and how by speech can it be reached?'

4. dina-rātri-vibheda-nirākaraṇam uditānuditasya-nirākaraṇam
 yadi caika-nirantara-sarva-śivam
 ravi-candram asau jvalanaś ca katham.

'It rejects distinctions of day and night. To it there is neither rising nor setting. If Reality is one, continuous, all-pervading and all-holy what does it avail to it if the sun shines or the moon shines?'

5. gata-kāma-vikāma-vibheda iti gata-ceṣṭa-vi-ceṣṭa-vibheda iti
 yadi caika-nirantara-sarva-śivam
 bahir-antara-bhinna-matiś ca katham.

'It transcends desire or desirelessness, activity or inactivity. If Reality is the one, seamless, the All, and the holy, what avails the distinction of the outer or the inner and their related attitudes?'

6. yadi sāra-visāra-vihīna iti yadi śūnya-viśūnya-vihīna iti
 yadi caika-nirantara-sarva-śivam
 prathamam ca katham caramam ca katham.

'If it is devoid of the distinction of the essential or the inessential, the void or the full, if Reality is one, seamless, the All and the holy, what avails to it as the distinction of the first and the last?'

7. yadi bheda-vibheda-nirākaranam yadi vedaka-vedya-nirākaranam
 yadi caika-nirantara-sarva-śivam
 tritayam ca katham turīyam ca katham?

'If it is devoid of the distinction of difference and non-difference, of the knower and the known; if it is the one, seamless reality, the All and the holy, of what avail is the third state or the fourth state to it?'

8. gaditāviditam na hi satyam iti viditāviditam na hi satyam iti
 yadi caikanirantara-sarva-śivam visayendriya-buddhi-manāmsi katham.

'Truth is not that which is spoken of but ununderstood; known but yet not known. If Reality is one, seamless, the All and the holy, of what avail is the object, the senses, the intellect and the mind?'

9. gaganam pavano nahi satyam iti dharanī-dahano na hi satyam iti
 yadi caika-nirantara-sarva-śivam
 jaladaś ca katham sahlam ca katham.

'If space and air are unreal, if earth and fire are unreal, if Reality is one, seamless, the All and the holy, what becomes of the rain-bearing clouds and of water that pours?'

10. yadi kalpita-loka-nirākaranam yadi kalpita-deva-nirākaranam
 yadi caika-nirantara-sarva-śivam guna-doṣa-vicāra-matiś ca katham.

'If the imagined worlds are rejected, if the imagined gods are eschewed, if Reality is one, seamless, the All and the holy, whence is the relevance of good and evil, ratiocination and prayer?'

11. maraṇāmarāṇaṁ hi nirākaraṇaṁ karaṇākaraṇaṁ hi nirākaraṇaṁ yadi caika-nirantara-sarva-śivaṁ gamaṇāgamaṇaṁ hi kathaṁ vadati.

‘If it eschews distinctions of death or life, the done and the undone, if Reality is one, seamless, the All and the holy, where is the relevance of terms like motion or motionlessness?’

12. prakṛtiḥ puruṣo na hi bheda iti na hi kāraṇa-kārya-vibheda iti
yadi caika-nirantara-sarva-śivaṁ
puruṣāpuruṣaṁ ca kathaṁ vadati.

‘The distinction of matter or spirit is not of any avail here, nor that of cause and effect. If Reality is one, seamless, the All and the supreme good, how can “personal” and “impersonal” be ascribed to it?’

13. tṛtīyaṁ na hi duḥkha-samāgamaṇaṁ na guṇad dvitīyasya samāgamaṇaṁ
yadi caika-nirantara-sarva-śivaṁ
sthaviraś ca yuvā ca śiṣuś ca kathaṁ.

‘Of old age, youth and infancy, the last is said to be a state untouched by sorrow, the second, that of youth, is said to be careless of virtue. If Reality is one, seamless, the All and the holy, whence is the division of dotage, youth or infancy?’

14. nanu āśrama-varṇa-vihīna-param
nanu kāraṇa-kartṛ-vihīna-param
yadi caika-nirantara-sarva-śivaṁ
avinaṣṭa-vinaṣṭa-matiś ca kathaṁ.

‘The highest being transcends distinctions of stages of life and classes of society, of cause and agent. If Reality is one, seamless, the All and the holy, what is that which is lost and what is that which is gained?’

15. grasiṭāgrasiṭaṁ ca vitathyaṁ iti janitājanitaṁ ca vitathyaṁ iti
yadi caika-nirantara-sarva-śivaṁ
avināśi vināśi kathaṁ hi bhavet.

‘The distinction of the eaten and the uneaten, the produced and unproduced are irrelevant to it. If Reality is one, seamless, the All and the holy, there is nothing that endures and nothing that is destroyed.'

16. puruṣāpuruṣasya vinasṭam iti vanitāvanitasya vinasṭam iti
 yadi caika-nirantara-sarva-śivam avinoda-vinoda-matiś ca katham.

'Distinctions of man or no man, of woman or no woman are irrelevant to it. If Reality is one, seamless, the All and the holy, where is the distinction of pleasure or displeasure?'

17. yadi moha-viśāda-vihīna paro yadi saṁśaya-śoka-vihīna parah
 yadi caika-nirantara-sarva-śivam
 aham eti mameti katham ca punah

'If states of mind like intoxication and depression, doubt or despair do not have relevance to it, if Reality is one, seamless, the All and the holy, where is again the relevance of "I" and the "mine"?''

18. nanu dharma-vidharma-vināśa iti nanu bandha-vibandha-vināśa iti
 yadi caika-nirantara-sarva-śivam
 iha duḥkha-viduḥkha-matiś ca katham

'Distinctions of merit or demerit are annulled in it; so also of bondage or freedom. If Reality then is one, seamless, the All and the holy, there can be no relevance of pain or no pain '

- 19 na hi yājñika-yajna-vibhāga iti na hutāśana-vastu-vibhāga iti
 yadi caika-nirantara-sarva-śivam
 vada karma-phalāni bhavanti katham.

'To it the distinction of the sacrificer and the sacrifice does not apply; nor that of the sacrificial fire and the thing offered to it. If Reality is one, seamless, the All and the holy, what becomes of the rewards of rituals performed?'

20. nanu śoka-viśoka-vimukta iti nanu darpa-vidarpa-vimukta iti
 yadi caika-nirantara-sarva-śivam
 nanu rāga-virāga-matiś ca katham.

'It is free from the distinction of grief and no grief, pride and no pride. If Reality is one, seamless, the All and the holy, of what avail is the distinction of passion and dispassion?'

21. na hi moha-vimoha-vikāra iti na hi lobha-vilobha-vikāra iti
 yadi caika-nirantara-sarva-śivam
 hy aviveka-viveka-matiś ca katham.

'The distinction of infatuation and apathy, loss or gain does not apply to it. If Reality is one, seamless, the All and the holy, what meaning is there in the distinction of discrimination or lack of discrimination?'

22. tvām aham na hi hanta kadācid api kula-jāti-vicāram asatyam iti aham eva śivaḥ paramārtha iti abhivādanam atra karomi katham.

'Verily you and I are indeed never there. The enquiries about family and caste are meaningless. I alone am the Holy one and the highest. Whom then can I salute with reciting my genealogy?'

23. guru-śiṣya-vicāra-viśirṇa iti upadeśa vicāra-viśirṇa iti
 aham eva śivaḥ paramārtha iti abhivādanam atra karomi katham.

'There is nothing like guru and disciple and there is nothing like instruction. I am the absolute auspicious truth. To whom am I to prostrate?'

24. na hi kalpita-deha-vibhāga iti na hi kalpita-loka-vibhāga iti
 aham eva śivaḥ paramārtha iti abhivādanam atra karomi katham.

'No distinctions of imagined diverse bodies nor of diverse abodes are relevant to it. I alone am the Holy one, the Highest Goal. Whom then can I salute with reciting my genealogy?'

25. sarajo virajo na kadācid api nanu nirmala-niścala-śuddha iti
 aham eva śivaḥ paramārtha iti abhivādanam atra karomi katham.

'To it does not apply distinctions of the sinful nor of cleanliness, restfulness and purity. I alone am the Holy one, the Highest Goal. Whom then can I salute with reciting my genealogy?'

26. na hi deha-vidēha-vikalpa itī anrtam ca rtaṁ na hī satyam itī aham eva śivaḥ paramārtha itī abhivādanam atra karomi katham.

'The distinctions of having a body, truth or untruth, have no relevance to it. I alone am the Holy one, the Highest Goal. Whom then can I salute with reciting my genealogy?'

27. vindati vindati nahi nahi yatra chando-lakṣanam nahi nahi tatra
 samarasa-magno bhāvita-pūtaḥ
 pralapati tattvam param avadhūtaḥ.

'Where there is nothing to be logically apprehended, there is nothing that could be stated in rhetorical language. Immersed in the ecstasy of communion and inwardly inspired, the Avadhūta proclaims the highest truth.'

iti śrī dattātreyā-vīracitāyām avadhūtagītayām svāmi-kārtika-samvāde svātma-samvittiyupadeśe mokṣa-nirṇayo nāma śaṣṭo dhyāyaḥ.

'Thus the sixth chapter entitled "The Determination of Liberation in the course of the instruction of the Wisdom pertaining to Self in the discourse that took place between svāmi and kārtika in the Avadhūta-Gītā of Śrī Dattātreyā".'

CHAPTER VII

Thus spake Dattātreyā:

1. rathyā-karpaṣa-vīracita-kanthah punyāpunya-vivarjita-panthah śūnyāgāre tiṣṭhati nagno śuddha-niranjana-samarasa-magnah.

'There stands he bare in an empty abode, pure and unadulterated, absorbed in the essence of things, wearing a garland of rags picked up on the road and treading a path which is beyond good and evil.'

2. lakṣyālakṣya-vivarjita-lakṣyo yuktāyukta-vivarjita dakṣaḥ kevala-tattva-niranjana-pūtaḥ vādavivādaḥ katham avadhūtaḥ.

‘His aim is neither to aim or not aim at an object. His skill is to steer clear of what is appropriate or inappropriate. He is sanctified by the spotless truth of self-sufficiency. Whence then any dispute about this self-sufficient sage?’

3. āśā-pāśa-vibandhana-muktaḥ śaucācāra-vivarjita-yuktaḥ evaṁ sarva-vivarjita-śāntaḥ tattvaṁ śuddha-niranjana-avantāḥ.

‘He is free from the fetters of desire. He fares well though freed from ritual purity and ceremonial conduct. He is tranquil though deprived of all. Those who know this truth become pure and free from dross.’

4. katham iha deha-videha-vicāraḥ katham iha rāga-virāga-vicāraḥ nirmala-niścala-gaganākāraṁ svayaṁ iha tattvaṁ saha-jākāraṁ.

‘Wherefore here is the debate of body or bodylessness? Wherefore is the discussion of passion and passionlessness? He is taintless, unmoved, and is spacelike; himself the truth and innate truth.’

5. katham iha tattvaṁ vindati yatra rūpaṁ arūpaṁ katham iha tatra gaganākāraḥ paramo yatra viśayīkaraṇaṁ katham iha tatra.

‘How does one know the reality here? Whence is the formed and the formless here? It is like the spread out space and how can there be objectification here?’

6. gaganākāra-nirantara-haṁsaḥ tattva-viśuddha-niranjana-haṁsaḥ evaṁ katham iha bhinna-vibhinnaṁ bandha-vibandha-vikāra-vibhinnaṁ.

‘It is the eternal celestial swan, the pure spotless swan of truth. Whence is this division and multiplication? It is distinct from the modifications of bound or free.’

7. kevala-tattva-nirantara-sarvaṁ yoga-viyogau katham iha garvaṁ evaṁ parama-nirantara-sarvaṁ evaṁ katham iha sāra-visāraṁ.

'All is ever the one and only reality. Where is the sense of egoity as distinguished or undistinguished from it? Thus is the highest eternal truth of all. Where is here the question of essential or unessential?'

8. kevala-tattva-niranjana-sarvaṁ gaganākāra-nirantara-śuddhaṁ evaṁ katham iha saṅga-visaṅgaṁ satyaṁ katham iha ranga-viraṅgaṁ

'All is ever the one pure reality. Spacelike it is always pure. Where is then the relevance of attachment or detachment? Where is the relevance of truth having here a field or no field?'

9. yoga-viyogaḥ rahito yogī bhoga-vibhogaḥ rahito bhogī evaṁ carati hi maṇḍaṁ maṇḍam manasā kalpita-sahajānandaṁ.

'The yogī is free from being yoked or unyoked. He is the bhogī (the enjoyer) of the enjoyable and the unenjoyable. The native bliss that springs from the mind spreads itself gently and glidingly.'

10. bodha-vibodhaḥ satataṁ yukto dvaitādvaitaiḥ katham iha muktaḥ sahajo virajaḥ katham iha yogī śuddha-niranjana-samarasa-bhogī.

'He who is always pre-occupied with what is correct teaching and what is incorrect teaching can never be freed from the dispute of duality and non-duality. How is this yogī free from defects innately so? He is the pure, sinless, aesthetically balanced bhogī (enjoyer) of life.'

11. bhagnābhagna-vivarjita-bhagno lagnālagna-vivarjita-lagnaḥ evaṁ katham iha sāra-visāraḥ samarasa-tattvaṁ gaganākāraḥ.

'He is the breaker of the distinction between the broken and the unbroken. He clings to the nullification of the distinction between clinging and non-clinging. Whence has arisen here the distinction of the essential and the non-essential? Spacelike, it is the reality that evenly balances all.'

12. satatam-sarva-vivarjita-yuktaḥ sarvam tattva-vivarjita-muktaḥ evam katham iha jivita-maraṇam dhyānādhyānaiḥ katham iha karaṇam.

'He is ever distinguished from things. He is ever free from all intellectual principles. Whence then can we speak of its birth or death? And what will meditation or no meditation avail here?'

13. indrajālam idam sarvam yathā maru-marīcikā akhaṇḍitam anākāro vartate kevalaḥ śivaḥ.

'All this is bewitching and lures like a mirage in the desert. Śiva is impartite, formless and self-sufficient.'

14. dharmādaḥ mokṣa-paryantam nirīhāḥ sarvathā vyaṁ katham rāga-virāgaś ca kalpayanti vipaścitaḥ.

'We have no desire for anything ranging from righteousness to liberation. How therefore can the wise confuse up attachment or detachment?'

15. vindati vindati na hi na hi yatra
 chando-likṣaṇam na hi na hi tatra
 samarasa-magno bhāvita-pūtaḥ
 pralapati tattvam param avadhūtaḥ.

'Where there is nothing to be known there, metrical words and measured lines are of no avail, the highest sage, pure in conception and steeped in the bliss of harmony, cries this truth out.'

iti śrī dattātreyā-viracitāyām avadhūtagītāyām saptamo adhyāyaḥ.

'Thus the seventh chapter in "The Instruction of one's own Ātman" in the course of the discourse between Svāmi and Kārtika in the Avadhūta-Gītā composed by Śrī Dattātreyā.'

CHAPTER VIII

Thus spake Dattātreyā:

1. tvad-yātrayā vyāpakatā hatā te dhyānena cetah-paratā hatā te stutyā mayā vākparatā hatā te ksamasva nityam trividhāparādhām.

'By my going on a pilgrimage, the truth of your all-pervadingness is annihilated. By my meditation, the truth of your pure consciousness is annulled. By my praise, the truth of your transcending speech is cancelled. O Forgive me for these three daily sins of mine.'

2. kāmair ahatadhīr dānto mrdūh śucir akimcanah anīho mitabhuk śāntah sthīro maccharano munīh.

'The sage who has resorted to me is steady and unassailed by desires, is gentle, clean, unowning things, uncovetous, a spare eater, tranquil and firm.'

3. apramatto gabhīrātmā dhṛtimān jīta-saḍ-gunah amānī mānadaḥ kalpo maitraḥ kārunikah kavīh.

'He is unintoxicated and a profound soul. He is courageous and the conqueror of the six foes within. He is humble, respectful, helpful, friendly and expressive.'

4. kṛpālurakṛta-droḥaḥ titiksuh sarva-dehinām satya-sāro anavadyātmā samas sarvopakāraḥ.

'And one who is compassionate, harmless, the most enduring of all beings, of the essence of truth, of a sinless disposition, unaffected, doing good to all (is the Philosopher, avadhūta).'

5. avadhūta-lakṣaṇam varṇam jñātavyam bhagavattamam veda-varṇārtha-tattvajñaiah veda-vedānta-vādibhih.

'The character of avadhūta, the philosopher, must be understood by means of these letters, (a, va, dhi and ta) by those who are the most sacred, who know the truth contained in the meaning of the Vedic letters and who expound Veda and Vedānta.'

6. āśā-pāśa-vinirmuktaḥ ādi-madhyānta-nirmalaḥ ānande vartate nityaṁ akāraṁ tasya lakṣaṇaṁ.

'He is free from the bondage of desire. He is pure at the start, middle and finish. He lives always in spiritual bliss. The letter "a" meaning all this is his definition.'

7. vāsanā varjitā yena vaktavyaṁ ca nirāmayam vartamāneṣu varteta vakāraṁ tasya lakṣaṇaṁ.

'All traces of previous deeds are abandoned by him. There is only one thing to be expounded by him and that is the taintless. He is fixed to those things that are present. The letter "va" meaning all this in his mark.'

8. dhūli-dhūsara-gātrāṇi dhūta-citto nirāmayah dhāraṇa-dhyāna-nirmukto dhūkāras tasya lakṣaṇaṁ.

'His limbs are besmeared with ashes. His mind is controlled. He is tingeless. He is absolutely free from meditation with interval and meditation with no interval. The letter "dhū" meaning this is his mark.'

9. tattva-cintā dhṛtā yena cintā-ceṣṭā-vivarjitah tamohaṅkāra-nirmuktaḥ takāras tasya lakṣaṇaṁ.

'By him meditation on Truth is taken up. He is free from anxiety and activity. He is untouched by dullness and egoism. The letter "ta" meaning all this is his mark.'

10. ātmānaṁ cāmṛtaṁ hitvā abhinnaṁ mokṣaṁ avyayaṁ gatoḥi kutsitaḥ kākaḥ vartate narakam prati.

'Forsaking the nectar of Ātman and the non-dual imperishable one, he goes like a contemptible crow towards hell.'

11. manasā karmaṇā vācā tyajatām mṛga-locanā na te svargo apavargo vā sānandaṁ hṛdayaṁ yadi.

'If you give up the desire for deer-eyed women in mind, speech and conduct and if your heart is full of joy you have neither heaven nor hell.'

12. na jānāmi katham tena nirmitā mṛga-locanā viśvāsa-ghātakīm viddhi svarga-mokṣa-sukhārgalam.

'Know her to be the betrayer of your affections and an obstacle to the attainment of heaven or final release. I know not how the deer-eyed woman was created.'

13. mūtra-śonita-durgandhe hy amedhya-dvāra-dūṣite carma-kunḍe ye ramante te līpyante na saṁśayaḥ.

'Without doubt they are sinners who delight in skin holes with foul smell of blood and urine and contact with excretory opening.'

14. kauṣīlya-ḍaṁbha-saṁyuktā satyaśauca-vivarjitā kenāpi nirmitā nārī bandhanam sarvadehinām

'Someone has created woman, wicked and vain, devoid of truth and purity. Alas, she is the bondage of all beings.'

15. triloka-janani dhātrī sā bhagī narako dhruvam tasyām jāto ratas tatra hā hā samsāra-saṁsthitiḥ.

'She is the mother of the three worlds and is the sustainer of them. She has the genital passage through which all things are born, a veritable hell, strange it is that creatures are devoted to that through which they have painfully emerged. Hence the bondage, ha! ha!'

16. jñāmi narakam nārīm dhruvam jñāmi bandhanam yasyām jāto ratas tatra punaḥ tatraiva dhāvati

'I know that a woman is a hell. She is indeed bondage. One who is born in her becomes attached to her. In turn he runs into herself.'

17. bhagādi-kuca-paryantam samviddhi narakārnavam ye ramante punaḥ tatra taranti narakam katham.

'Beginning with the secret organ up to the breast understand that it is the ocean of hell. How can those that are attached to it get themselves rid of hell?'

18. viṣṭādi-narakam ghoram bhagam ca parinirmitam
kim u paśyasi re citta katham tatraiva dhāvasi.

'Excretory organ is the foulest hell. Foul is the genital passage made of the same stuff. O mind! Do you not see this? Why then do you run after it?'

19. bhagena carma-kunḍena durgandhena vranena ca khanḍitam hi jagat sarvam sadevāsura-mānusaṁ.

'By the secret organ of a woman which is nothing but a hole made of skin, the smell of which is foul and which is full of sores, all this world of Gods, demons and men go to pieces.'

20. dehārnave mahā ghore pūritam caiva śoṇitam kenāpi nīrmitā nārī bhagam caiva hy adhomukham.

‘The most fearful ocean is the body. It is filled up with blood. The woman is created by some one. Her secret organ is the passage downwards.’

21. āntare narakam viddhi kautilyam bāhya-maṇḍitam lalitām iha paśyanti mahā-mantra virodhinīm.

‘Understand that there is hell inside. Deceit is the external ornament. She is taken to be Lalitā (the friend of supreme truth) but she is really the enemy of supreme truth.’

22. ajnātvā jīvitam labdham bhavas tatraiva dehinām.
aho jāto ratas tatra aho bhava-viḍambanā.

‘Without knowing the life that is given the creatures have their origin in a woman. Alas! One who is born there is attached to her. This is the game of bondage.’

23. tatra mugdhā ramante ca sadevāsura-mānavāḥ te yānti narakam ghoram satyam eva na saṁśayaḥ.

‘These fools, men as well as Gods and demons, take pleasure there (in woman). They indeed without doubt get into fearful hell.’

24. agni-kunḍa-samā nārī ghr̥ta-kumbha samo naraḥ saṁsargeṇa vilīyeta tasmāt tām parivarjayet.

‘Woman is like a furnace and man is like a jar of ghee which disappears by contact with the former. Therefore it has to be given up.’

25. gauḍī mādhvī tathā paṣṭī vijneyā tri-vidhā surā caturthī strī surā jneyā yadedam mohitam jagat.

‘Know that there are three kinds of intoxicating wine. One is obtained from jaggery, another from honey and the third from flour. A woman is the fourth of these. All the world goes mad with it.’

26. madya-pānam mahā-pāpam nārī-sangas tathaiva ca
tasmād dvayam parityajya tattva-niṣṭho bhaven muniḥ.

‘Wine quaffing is looked upon as a deadly sin. So is association with woman. The wise man is one who gives up both and stands devoted to truth.’

27. cintā-krāntam dhātu-baddham śarīram naṣṭe citte dhātavo yānti nāśam tasmāc cittam sarvato raksanīyam svasthe citte buddhayaḥ sambhavanti.

'The body is bound by its elementary constitutents and pensive with care. In the absence of consciousness the elements begin to dis-integrate. So consciousness must be preserved at all costs. With consciousness intact, reason thrives.'

28. dattātreyāvadhūtena nīrmitānanda-rūpinā ye paṭhanti ca śṛṇvanti teṣāṃ naiva punarbhavaḥ.

'This is the exposition of Dattātreyā, the Philosopher, of the form of beatific bliss. Those that read this and study this are those to whom re-birth never occurs.'

iti śrī dattātreyā-kṛtāyām avadhūta-gītāyām svāmi-kārtika-samvāde svātma-samvitty-upadeśe aṣṭamodhyāyah.
 'Thus is the eighth chapter in "The Instruction of Self-knowledge" in the discourse of Svāmi and Kārtika in the Avadhūta-Gītā composed by Śrī Dattātreyā.'

CHAPTER V

A CRITICAL ESTIMATE OF THE PHILOSOPHY OF DATTATREYA (with its background):

I. DATTĀTREYA: THE TRUTH OF EQUIPOISE

NO study of philosophy is complete without a critical estimate. Critical estimate of a philosophy lends a personal touch to the philosophy. In India from the very outset philosophy has become necessarily personal, adhyātma, in character. A philosophy which is not personal lacks sincerity in it. Truth without sincerity is inconceivable. Further, a touch of personal character makes philosophy indispensable. This explains the sanctity and worthwhileness to the individual of philosophical literature.

In this work prayer has preceded philosophical exposition. Prayer here is no petitionary prayer of a conventional religion. It is all aspiration of the soul and attunement of the spirit to the lofty subject embarked upon.

I began the exposition of this philosophy with a study of myself. The birth of a man is never his origin de novo. His mind is never a tabula rasa. Every birth presupposes much more than what the born man may experience throughout his life, granting that he has a long and enduring life. With the birth of a man is heralded deep rooted residual impressions and tendencies which for many lifetimes had been forming in the individual (samskāras and vāsanās) which set the course of his present life. Besides, obligations come to be cast on him the discharging of which is demanded of him. This is the philosophy of the three-fold obligations, ṛṇatraya—obligation to the Gods, obligation to the fathers and obligation to the men of wisdom (seers), ṛṣis—deva ṛṇa, pitṛ ṛṇa and ṛṣi ṛṇa. Man is born in a world imbued with invisible spiritual beings through whom the Divine manifests itself. These are the gods, the guardians of order, ritual and moral. To them man owes certain duties. He is born in a family which has had its progenitor who gives man his physical being and leaves him a spiritual legacy. Such are the fathers to whom we owe an obligation. Besides the material and social environment into which man is born, he is ensconced in a non-material spiritual environment created by men of wisdom who give us a spiritual birth and make us the twice-born, with the birth of wisdom. We thus become their spiritual heirs and come to owe many an obligation to them. Relatively speaking the former two debts—debt to Gods and debt to fathers become enlivened only in the measure with which the obligations to the Rsis or men of wisdom are fulfilled. Without wisdom the former two are infructuous. With wisdom they lead one to great happiness. Hence the debt to men of wisdom may be considered to be the governing principle of life.

Soon after I became consciously aware of my station in life it was the debt to the men of wisdom that attracted me most. I began to question the truth of my life. I began to conceive and understand the urge that was responsible for this attitude. I was not helpless. There was already the response that came from my debt to men of wisdom. Problems and solutions of these men came to my mind resulting in a sudden flash that after all the attitude of identity, advaita-dṛṣṭi, or the outlook of identity, advaita-bhāvanā, is the real solution for the riddles of life. Men suffer not so much from the ailments of life as from the lack of a right attitude or proper outlook towards what life has to offer. It is the attitude of prejudice, partiality and passion that is often found to be the cause of misery. The only remedy for this circumstance is the attitude or outlook of identity, of wholeness and of perfection. With the idea of separatism man is thrown into an exclusivistic and static condition. But with the idea of oneness of things, oneness through the Absolute, man attains to a comprehensive and all-inclusive vision. Hence duality, dvaita, separation, is wrong and integral unity, advaita is right. Duality negates life and unity enriches it.

The Sanskrit equivalents of duality and non-duality used in philosophical parlance are respectively dvaita and advaita. These words in this connection must be taken only in the senses relevant to the present discussion. Enough is already indicated in this direction. If dvaita were to mean mere breaking without the hope of unifying, mere analysis without synthesis, and if this attitude governs life, then it is a wrong perspective of life. Similarly if advaita were to mean mere putting together without proper recognition of opposing elements, then it is mere confusion. Hence dvaita must be such that it must transcend itself and make room for advaita. Advaita must be such that it must be all-inclusive giving at the same time proper recognition to different and opposing elements of life. Thus dvaita and advaita are not opposed to each other. Each gives a meaning and purpose to the other. To bring these two together is therefore an art by itself. The greatness of philosophy consists in the successful expression of this art. When these two are thus brought together and harmonised there is more propriety in calling the resultant product advaita, identity rather than dvaita, duality.

These reflections of mine were the combined result of all that moulded my life. At the same time they gave me a proper perspective to embark on the study of the subject. I began to reflect on the works I studied so far. I saw in the light of my study richer and richer meanings emerging in my reflections. By way of illustration of this truth I recalled to my mind passages from the Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka Upaniṣad, Viṣṇu-Purāṇa, Vāsiṣṭha-Rāmāyaṇa, Tripurā-Rahasya, Bhagavad-Gītā, and so on.

What we actually experience is the world of multiplicity. If the reflection on the truth of this world takes place, it soon vanishes and gives way to the concept of unity. Judged from this point of view the world of multiplicity loses its reality and finally the world of unity, advaita, becomes ultimate. Consequently the individuality of multiplicity comes to be more of the character of imagination. In recognition of this idea the experience of this world is often compared to illusion in philosophical works. This comparison is not so much the denial of the world as the evaluation of it.

It may however be noted that there are two orders of the world—the world of multiplicity and the world of unity. They do not exist separately. Implicitly or explicitly both are present in the same idea whatever its character may be; for multiplicity is an appearance and unity is reality. The relation of the two is just the relation that subsists between appearance and reality.

There are now apparently two possibilities of looking at the world. Some may see only multiplicity. They therefore do not rise above the commonsense view of things. To see unity in multiplicity requires vision. Men of vision are called philosophers. Ever since the dawn of philosophy in the world, it is vision, the vision of seeing unity in multiplicity that has marked philosophic thinking. It is this vision on a lower plane that has given rise to certain fruitful fields of scientific research. The difference between science and philosophy would reduce itself to this. All-inclusiveness is the characteristic of any systematic thinking. It is therefore the characteristic of both science and philosophy. But the inclusiveness of science is relative to the subject matter of the study. For this reason it is restricted to the latter. Every case of restriction is artificial. Hence science suffers from artificiality. But the all-inclusiveness of philosophy is beyond all relativity, restriction and artificiality. If in any sense it is narrow, then it ceases to be philosophy and becomes a dogma.

It is owing to this philosophic vision in different degrees that both in India and outside men of science have finally become philosophers. In India a thinker who has given rise to a philosophic tradition is necessarily a man of a serene scientific outlook. This is amply illustrated by a reference to the philosophers of the Darśanas, Nyāya-Vaiśeṣika, Yoga and so on. Similar is the case with regard to the philosophers outside India. To illustrate this view point with a view to show the importance of the outlook of unity I recalled particular passages from some modern philosophers such as William James, Whitehead, Bergson and Jung who represent important modern philosophical thinking.

The study of the several trends of thought left me with the notion that the only way by which philosophical perplexity may be laid to rest is to make a bold bid for the reasseveration of the philosophic vision of Advaita. The vision must be of the character of illumination. It is therefore bound to be spiritual in character. The wholeness of the vision and its synthetic character has made the Yoga Śāstra declare that 'all is by intuition', 'prātibhād vā sarvaṃ'. The term used is prātibhā which literally means brilliant idea, happy thought or well-founded presumption. Prātibhā has made men philosophers, while it is the same interest that has made men scientists. Hence mere science which pauses at the stage of analysis does not help illumination. However great its result be in the empirical field it does not take the individual life to the integral vision of reality which alone is the source of lasting happiness.

How does the philosophic vision, prātibhā, come? It is not acquired. It is unborn, anādi. Its source is the ultimate reality itself. Even as this reality is the source of life as such, it is the source of illumination. Ultimate reality is called in Sanskrit, Īśvara. Its English equivalent is the philosophical expression 'ruler of the universe' or, in popular parlance, God. Illumination is therefore the gift of God. It is the grace of God. It is to use the expression in Sanskrit, Īśvarānugraha.

The spiritual illumination, prātibhā is what makes us see unity in diversity. Diversity is bondage. Unity is liberation. To separate them is again a case of diversity. To transcend this difficulty unity ought to be inclusive of diversity. This is to see diversity or multiplicity to be an expression of unity. It is in fact the language of unity. To realise this is to know how diversity or multiplicity is transcended and unity is established. There is nothing that governs unity, but diversity is governed by unity. Hence unity is spontaneity. With the realisation of unity diversity disappears. In other words with the realisation of liberation bondage disappears. Hence diversity and unity form unity. They are different aspects of the same truth presented as unity.

This is the lesson I learnt from the Vedic and the Upaniṣadic expressions of the ultimate reality. In my search for a clear exposition of the same truth differently expressed as Nārāyaṇa, Viṣṇu, Śiva, Īśvara, Maheśvara, Ātman, Brahman, Dattātreyā and so on, to my mind the concept of Dattātreyā appealed most only because I could illustrate the truth of identity or unity more easily and readily to myself without making the experience of multiplicity meaningless and the concept of unity an abstraction. By studying the concept of Dattātreyā I came to understand more clearly than before that in the two stages of an individual life—bondage, bandha and liberation, mokṣa, there is threaded a common truth. Liberation is unity with the ultimate truth. Consistently with this bondage is the stage where liberation is accomplished while this life lasts, and completeness of philosophic vision is effected. These two are respectively called jīvanmukti and avadhūta. Dattātreyā as the unity of all is jīvanmukta, liberated though alive, avadhūta, the philosopher and the truth ultimate, Brahman. This is how in the unity characterised as Dattātreyā there is the recognition of both duality, dvaita and identity, advaita, each making the other significant and meaningful.

My devotion to the study of this truth brought with it more problems and the necessity for their solution. Before embarking on the actual study of the philosophy of Dattātreyā what happened within me as recorded here indicates a gradual growth of the need of philosophy for me.

In making a serious study of Dattātreyā it was inevitable that I should resort to meditation on a particular verse of meditations presented by the Śāṇḍilya-Upaniṣad. Soon after I began to interpret this verse I had to make myself sure that the attributes ascribed to Dattātreyā are not accidental or conventional properties but are fraught with tremendous significance for spiritual endeavour and understanding of ultimate truth. But with this determination I was confronted with a serious difficulty, that of bringing together the various concepts that defined Dattātreyā. In this circumstance I could only think of the usual meaning of the Sanskrit terms Śiva and so on. Usually Śiva means a deity or God. In calling Dattātreyā Śiva the identity of the two needed justification. Śiva may also mean auspicious. In this case this attribute may not necessarily mean the essence by which Dattātreyā is Dattātreyā. He is further described as peaceful, śānta. How the auspicious Śiva is the peaceful, śānta, needed justification. Why should one who is auspicious be peaceful? Dattātreyā is further characterised as having the splendour of the gem called indranīla. This means that Dattātreyā must be a person. If he is a person, then he must necessarily have all the merits and defects of owning a body. He is next described as master or Lord, prabhu. But this attribute does not bring out the essence of Dattātreyā. For this word as applied to a person who is dependent on a body cannot yield a complete and satisfactory meaning. This is how each attribute of Dattātreyā gave way and no attribute could be maintained along with other attributes. Ordinarily when we have some religious interest we do not see this difficulty seriously. We have a tendency to slur over difficulties and feel that everything is all right. But when serious reflection took place, these seemingly little discrepancies obstructed the thinking process, and in this circumstance no meditation became possible.

This state of mind did not last long. Soon Bādarāyana's principle of Vedic interpretation and in that light the interpretation of the whole field of experience came to my mind. This principle is called samanvaya by Bādarāyana. Samanvaya is the expression of the outlook of unity of thought in the Vedas. This is in essence the outlook that results in the practice of interpreting a Vedic word in terms of the whole Veda. The test of the soundness of this method of interpretation is the fact that there arises no discrepancy either between two expressions of Veda or between two ideas of truth arising from the expressions of Veda.

So I attempted the present meditation of Vedic passages in terms of Veda. My study may not have been exhaustive. I may have not done full justice to Bādarāyana's principle of samanvaya. Confining my attention to the interest of presenting to myself a consistent view of the sketch of Dattātreyā I studied his attributes in the light of other Vedic expressions studying the same attributes so that each attribute gave me the glimpse of the Absolute Truth and on the whole the Truth of Identity, advaita. I also found that this method of study was perfectly justified by the way in which the Dattātreya-Upaniṣad prescribes the process of meditation on the Truth in the mūlāmantra. This meditation is evidently a powerful expression of the absolute omnipotence of Dattātreya.

The truth of identity is not achieved merely by attaining to the unity of god-head. If this identity is considered to stand outside the world of experience the dualism is not transcended and in this case the concept of unity becomes a mere verbal enunciation. In order to avoid this difficulty, to hold that the world is unreal is to negate the problem itself instead of solving it. Life is bondage. Beyond life is liberation. Beyond life is not the negation of life. It is the state of transcendence. The Truth of unity must cover both. Otherwise it is no truth. To sacrifice transcendence in the interest of life is materialism. But to sacrifice life in the interest of transcendence is to revel in imagination. In either case life is a misery and in spite of the negation of either, dualism is not overcome. The dualism is overcome and misery is transcended only if the same truth is seen to run concurrently in both these phases.

What is then, in view of this truth, the real essence of bondage? It is the presence of transcendence in the so called bondage. The recognition of this presence expresses itself in two forms—detachment and devotion to Truth. Detachment is not to negate bondage. Nor is it running away from bondage. Both are impossible. It is the non-recognition of the binding character of bondage. It is in fact the recognition of the freeing character of the so called bondage. It is this recognition that is properly called detachment, vairāgya. In its presence, the so-called bondage ceases to exist and the state of the so-called bondage becomes purely a stage of life preliminary to liberation. There is thus no opposition between the two states.

This is the environment in which the truth of identity is readily appreciated. Appreciation of truth is devotion to it. This devotion is of the character of knowledge. It cannot be otherwise, that is, it cannot be of the character of emotion or of volition. Without knowledge these two are contentless and with knowledge they are superfluous and therefore they do not take place. To suppose that knowledge gives room for them is to overlook the immortal character of knowledge and this is to negate the life of transcendence, mokṣa.

What is knowledge? It is not a mere idea. It has a history behind and a growth after. It is therefore a continuity. It is active. It is cogitation. In no two moments is it the same. It is a way from the simple to the complex and from the complex to unity. It is a process involving in order, understanding, reflection and meditation. It is the whole of life having nothing outside. It is in this sense devotion to truth.

Identity is thus identity of detachment and devotion on the one hand and transcendence on the other. Dattātreyā is this identity. He is the life of detachment, life of devotion and transcendence. Detachment is liberation in life, jīvanmukti. Dattātreyā as the detached is the liberated in life, jīvanmukta. Hence the sketch of Dattātreyā is followed by Dattātreyā, the liberated in life. Who is competent to say anything about the state of being liberated in life? The answer is Dattātreyā himself. This accounts for a study of the Jīvanmukta-Gītā after the sketch of Dattātreyā. To make the text of Jīvanmukta-Gītā more readily intelligible I have presented an English rendering of each verse of the text.

It is thus a necessary aspect of the truth of identity that we must attempt to explain the value of liberation in life. Similarly the necessity for the incarnation of Dattātreyā as the son of Atri and Anasūya having all the attributes mentioned in the Upanisadic verse of meditation needed to be explained. This accounts for the appearance of a section on these aspects after the exposition of the Jīvanmukta-Gītā.

It is liberation in life, jīvanmukti, that explains purity of knowledge. Purity of knowledge is purity of devotion. This devotion being devotion to truth is devotion to knowledge, because truth is no other than knowledge. The nature of this knowledge is such that it presupposes itself and is followed by itself. It is immortal. It is philosophy. It is the state of being avadhūta. It is avadhūtatva. This accounts for the philosophy of avadhūta, defined as Dattātreyā coming after the Jīvanmukta-Gītā.

In working out the truth of advaita this philosophy arrives at a finer conception of the ultimate truth. It notes the misleading character of advaita as applied to Truth. With all its merits the term advaita, identity, is silent with regard to the functional side of the Truth. It does not bring out the richness of Reality and it does not give rise to the feeling of wonder, viśmaya, in the philosopher and this feeling is the necessary element in the spiritual bliss, ānanda.

The philosopher Dattātreyā for this reason transcends advaita and presents the truth in the name of sama or samarasa. This is the language of equipoise. It brings out the character of the absolute as being equal to all consisting of bondage and liberation. It is therefore the language of Identity manifesting itself in a more expressive manner and it readily kindles the feeling of wonder in the philosopher.

In the state of this wonderment the philosopher, avadhūta composed the Avadhūta-Gītā. This work is the expression of the philosophy of avadhūta. Its origin is Śruti. Śruti as a whole is the exposition of the truth of sama. The Avadhūta-Gītā is its shadow, and as such it is the language of ineffable joy, ānanda. In illustration of these ideas a study of the Avadhūta-Gītā is given at the end with its translation.

This is how unity of thought and unity of purpose are sought to be implemented throughout the exposition.

We may now see how these two unities, the unity of thought and unity of purpose operate on our minds. These unities are inter-related. Each is impossible without the other. Applying the inter-relation of these two to the present exposition we shall first explain how it is governed by unity of thought.

We come across three important texts in the course of the exposition—the verse of meditation, Jīvanmukta-Gītā and Avadhūta-Gītā. The most important thing that must result from our study of this work is the unity of thought running through these texts. Of these three texts the verse of meditation is an Upaniṣadic passage. The other two are on the basis of tradition taken to be the works of Dattātreyā. So the dates of these works must be those that belong to the period of time when Dattātreyā flourished. In the light of the Purāṇic version it is the period when Paraśurāma and Kartavīryārjuna were in the making. Speaking in terms of modern ideas it may be the period when the later Upaniṣads and early Smṛtis came into existence and this period is generally marked as about 1200 B.C. In support of this conclusion we may refer to three things:—(i) The nature of the composition. It is almost identical with the composition of the later Upaniṣads. (ii) Ideas pertaining to the pre-Darśana period—the word manas is taken to mean Brahman. Yoga is recognised to have only six limbs. Tarka is used in the sense of reasoning. Circumstances like these indicate the pre-Darśana character of the composition. (iii) The absence of reference to any Darśana including Uttara-Mīmāṃsā. There is no doubt the use of the word Vedānta. But it is as old as Veda itself, as it is evident in such passages as vedānta-vijnāna-suniścītārthāḥ (Muṇḍaka Upaniṣad). The composition of these two works indicates that they are prior to Bhagavad-Gītā. But there is a striking similarity in the theme of these two sets of works. Both insist on the importance of knowledge. Avadhūta-Gītā insists on jnānāmṛtam, and the Bhagavad-Gītā insists on knowledge as nahī jnānena sadṛśam. Both these works emphasise the truth of sama. Avadhūta-Gītā insists on samarasam and the Bhagavad-Gītā insists on the truth as nirdoṣam hi samam Brahma.

Consistently with the idea that the subject matter of the meditation prescribed by the Sāṅkhya-Upaniṣad is the same Dattātreyā who appeared as liberated though alive, jīvan-mukta and the philosopher avadhūta and who taught Jīvanmukta-Gītā and Avadhūta-Gītā, there is propriety in understanding the verse of meditation in the light of the latter two works. This means that the interpretation of each word of the meditation in terms of the passages from Śruti, that is, Upaniṣads, must also be grasped in the same light. This is how meditation in each round becomes more and more pronounced and effective and consequently all faculties of man get more and more united. Gradually there is the complete disappearance of distraction. This is what is called detachment in the real sense. The aspirant is consequently bound by nothing and he is liberated though alive.

In the Jīvanmukta-Gītā he is consistently characterised as the Knower of Self, ātma-jnānī. The content of knowledge is also given in each verse. This point requires elucidation. To know the content of knowledge as being such does not mean the knowledge of self. It at best means only that the verse says that the man who knows such and such an attribute of Self is the knower of Self. Knowledge of Self means seeing the content of Self. It is to understand the content of self. Hence the knowledge of Self is to understand Self. How does this understanding come? It is not a case of revelation, because revelation presupposes no preparation on the part of the aspirant. Nor is it a case of realisation, because apart from understanding realisation has no meaning. Understanding therefore comes from study. Unalloyed devotion, śraddhā, and insight, pratibhā, make the study readily fruitful. Two points must however be noted in following these ideas. (i) Understanding is by nature all comprehensive. One must not limit it according to one's convenience. Understood thus, understanding covers intuition, realisation and such other faculties. (ii) Anything that does not partake of the nature of understanding, call it intuition or what you will, becomes non-spiritual and with it the truth is made non-spiritual.

Knowledge of Self is therefore the outcome of study and understanding. Understanding involves reflection and assimilation. Study is that of philosophy. In the present context philosophy is Veda. To study Veda is to interpret the truth of Self as expounded by Veda in terms of Veda and in the process of this interpretation there is involved a conscious recognition of the uselessness of empirical sciences.

Meditation is thus study. Study is philosophy. Philosophy makes one detached. The detached one is fixed in Self. This one is the liberated though alive. To call this the state of realisation negates its spiritual character. It is rather the state of preparation for further progress. This state being of the character of knowledge must result in knowledge more definite and more comprehensive. This is the state of philosophy, the state of being avadhūta.

What avadhūta, the philosopher, breathes is a philosophy, holding good for all times and in all circumstances. The philosophy coming from him requires an avadhūta, the philosopher, to comprehend it. Being the song of Avadhūta, this philosophy is called Avadhūta-Gītā. Hence to study Avadhūta-Gītā presupposes a definite philosophic evolution.

With all its greatness, Avadhūta-Gītā is marked by extraordinary simplicity. Even a novice by a casual reading becomes greatly benefited. He receives some light which he cannot otherwise have even glimpsed though he may eventually fail to define it. In the interest of these readers some commonsense difficulties that they may conceive may be considered.

Some may feel that the teaching is barren as it negates every science, every discipline and every institution worth having. This difficulty resolves itself when the aspirant visualises the spiritual truth and ceases to attach undue importance to empirical ideas. Some may feel that the teaching is anti-social as it condemns the fair sex as such. But the fact is different. In the so-called condemnation the indispensability of the fair sex in the life here in which alone spiritual discipline is possible, is beautifully brought out. Further the so-called condemnation is a warning to men against women as objects of lust and to women against men as objects of lust. Women attract men. They must therefore be avoided. Men attract women. They must therefore be avoided. The condemnation of the fair sex in this connection refers to excess of all kinds usually termed licentiousness.

On its positive side Avadhūta-Gītā is a beautiful extension of the philosophy of equipoise, sama, and of 'not this, not this', neti-neti, as the elucidation of the former expounded in the Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka-Upaniṣad and discussed elaborately in all its details in the whole of the Veda. To understand and appreciate it correctly is a spiritual joy resulting in immortal knowledge, juānāmṛtaṁ, of the essence of equipoise, samarasaṁ, which is no other than liberation, mokṣa.

The aspirants of a lower order, after a study of this philosophy see greater significance in the verse of the meditation on Dattātreyā. They commence the meditation with the freshness of spring, thus: 'Dattātreyā, the auspicious and tranquil', Dattātreyāṁ śivaṁ śāntam. . . .

2. DATTĀTREYA: THE ALL COMPLETE DATTOHAM* DATTĀTREYA IS 'I'

I have entitled this concluding section as Dattoham, which means 'Datta, that is, Dattātreyā I am', because that is the sole end towards which the philosophy of the Avadhūta-Gītā moves. Identity is established, identity is Datta, that is Dattātreyā; Dattātreyā am I; and I am Identity; this is the affirmation known in Veda as 'That thou art', tat tvam asi, 'I am Brahman', aham brahmāsmi; 'This self is Brahman', ayamātmā brahma; and 'He I am', soham. This affirmation is the greatest tapas, meditation, a person can perform; in fact it is the only form of meditation. Meditation has been defined as tad hi tapaḥ, 'That is meditation'. What does 'that' mean?—'that' refers to the understanding and exposition of the all highest, the most auspicious truth—mahādeva, sadāśiva, the sadrūpa, viz., Brahman. Therefore it is meditation when a person affirms his identity with the divine, by stating 'I am Datta, that is, Dattātreyā', Dattātreyā I am', dattoham; 'He I am', soham; 'I am', aham asmi; 'I am auspicious', śroham. Merely asserting the affirmation does not establish identity. It is the grace of the Lord, īśvarānugraha which gives it. With the grace of the Lord, the meditation of affirmation of 'Datta, that is Dattātreyā I am', dattoham, becomes established in Identity. That is all and nothing more. As the philosopher, Avadhūta sings and affirms, 'The truth is knowledge immortal, of the essence of equipoise, space-like. That is "I".'

From this great meditation is born samarasaṁ. Samarasaṁ or equipoise, equality towards all, is the result of such austerity or meditation. What our economists dream and preach about but fail to achieve, what the Marxist dialectician explains with gusto as his sole right but does not adopt, this equipoise is a gift of the divine to one who becomes divine. This is the highest achievement; achievement if at all it can be called so. For this is something greater than all, It is all, It is the Highest, It is the establishment of oneself as the supreme 'I', after following the quest for 'Know the self' ātmānam viddhi—this is indeed the end of the Śruti-pramāṇa; satyaṁ jñānam anantaṁ brahma—that is samarasa. It is 'He I am' soham; 'Dattātreyā I am', dattoham, and so on.

To affirm 'Datta (Dattātreyā) I am', dattoham, is to attain equipoise. To be in equipoise is to have passed over the planes of the relative and the non-relative. It is to become submerged in it. Equipoise expressed as dattoham is kaivalya, samarasa, ānanda, śiva, jñāna, satya, tapas and all there is, is not and yet to be.

AUM DATTOHAM AUM

evaṁ śrī jayacāmarāja-nṛpatiḥ tattvaṁ ca dattādvayaṁ gītāṁ tan-mukha-nissṛtaṁ ca paramāṁ soham śivopāsayā vyācaṣṭe śruti-yukti-darśita-mahā-mārgaṁ paraṁ bhāvayan tat sarvaṁ ca sadāśivārpitaṁ asau devaḥ sadā syān mude.

'Thus Śrī Jaya-Chāmarāja nṛpati, as he was in meditation on Śiva as "He I am", following the royal path indicated by Śruti and Yukti, scripture and reason, expounded advaita, equipoise, the truth of the Lord Datta (Dattātreyā) and the teaching that emanated from his mouth. May this God be the source of happiness, eternal.'

carāṇaṁ pavitraṁ vitataṁ purāṇaṁ yena pūtaḥ tarati duṣkṛtāni tena pavitreṇa śuddhena pūtaḥ ati pāpmānaṁ aratiṁ tarema.

'The Divine is holy. It is all permeating. It is the most Ancient, being the source of all. By this the spiritual aspirant, adhikārin becomes holy and transcends all sins. Purified thus by the Holy and Pure Being may we overcome the gravest sin and the greatest misery.'

AUM NAMAḤ ŚIVĀYA AUM
AUM ŚĀNTIḤ ŚĀNTIḤ ŚĀNTIḤ

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Adhyātma-Upaniṣad
Advaya-Tāraka-Upaniṣad
Aitareya-Upaniṣad
Annapūrṇa-Upaniṣad
Avadhūta-Gītā
Avadhūta-Upaniṣad
Ātma-Upaniṣad
- Bergson. Two Sources of Morality and Religion.
Bhagavad-Gītā
Bhasma-Jābāla-Upaniṣad
Bhāgavata-Pūrāṇa
Bradley. Appearance and Reality
Brhad-Āraṇyaka-Upaniṣad
Brhad-Jābāla-Upaniṣad Brahma-Sūtra, also called Vedānta-Sūtra
Brahma-Sūtra-Bhāṣya by Śaṅkara
Brahma-Vidyā-Upaniṣad
- Chāndogya-Upaniṣad
- Dakṣiṇāmūrti Stotra
Dakṣiṇāmūrti-Upaniṣad
Dattātreyā Stotraṁ
Dattātreyā-Upaniṣad
Devī-Bhāgavata
Dhyāna-Bindu-Upaniṣad
- Guru-Caritam
Guru-Stotra
Gopāla-Pūrva-Tāpiny-Upaniṣad
- Hamsa-Upaniṣad
Haya-Grīva-Upaniṣad
- Indian Philosophy by Dr. S.
Radhakrishnan
Īśvāsyā-Upaniṣad
- Jīvanmukta-Gītā
Jīvanmukti-Viveka by Vidyāranya
- Kaivalya-Upaniṣad
Kaṭha-Upaniṣad
Kālāgni-Rudra-Upaniṣad
Kena-Upaniṣad
- Linga-Mahā-Purāṇa
- Mahā-Upaniṣad
Maitreyī-Upaniṣad
Mandala-Brāhmaṇa-Upaniṣad
Mantrika-Upaniṣad
Mānasollāsa (by Sureśvarācārya)
Māndūkya-Upaniṣad
Māndūkya-Kārikā (by Gaudapāda)
Mudgala-Upaniṣad
Muktika-Upaniṣad
Mundaka-Upaniṣad
- Nārada-Parivrājaka-Upaniṣad
Nārāyana-Upaniṣad
Nirālamba-Upaniṣad
Nṛsiṃha-Uttara-Tāpiny-Upaniṣad
Nyāya-Vaiśeṣika Sūtras
- Paingala-Upaniṣad
Parama-Hamṣa-Upaniṣad
Plotinus. Enneads
Purāṇas
Puruṣa Sūkta
Pūrva-Mīmāṃsa
- Raghuvamśa by Kālidāsa
Rg Veda
Rāma-Pūrva-Tāpiny-Upaniṣad
Rāma-Rahasya-Upaniṣad
Rāma-Uttara-Tāpiny Upaniṣad
- Sanyāsa-Upaniṣad
Śarabha-Upaniṣad
Sarva-Sāra-Upaniṣad
Sat-Praśna-Upaniṣad

Śāṇḍilya-Upaniṣad
 Śāṭhyāyanīya-Upaniṣad
 Sāyaṇa-Bhāṣya
 Śiva-Kavaca
 Śiva-Mahima-Stotra
 Śiva-Rahasya
 Sūta-Saṁhitā
 Spinoza's Ethics
 Śvetāśvatara-Upaniṣad

Taittirīya-Upaniṣad
 Tejo-Bindu-Upaniṣad
 Tripād - Vibhūti - Mahā - Nārāyaṇa-
 Upaniṣad

Tripurā-Rahasya
 Tripurā-Tāpiny-Upaniṣad

Varāha-Upaniṣad
 Varieties of Religious Experience:
 William James
 Viṣṇu Purāṇa
 Viṣṇu-Sahasranāma

Yajurveda (Kṛṣṇa)
 Yājñavalkya-Upaniṣad
 Yoga-Sūtra
 Yoga-Tattva-Upaniṣad
 Yoga-Vāsiṣṭha-Rāmāyaṇa

APPENDIX

Sanskrit Texts with References

(Corresponding to the foot-notes from 1 to 262 marked in the body of the book).

- (1) aiśvaraṃ paramaṃ tattvaṃ ādimadhyānta varjitam ādhāraṃ sarva-lokānāṃ anādhāraṃ avikriyaṃ anantānanda-bodhāmbu nidhum adbhuta-vikramam ambikā-patni īśanaṃ anīśaṃ pranamāmyaham

Sūta-Saṃhitā Vol. 1-2

- (2) saha nāvavatu
saha nau bhunaktu saha vīryaṃ karavāvahai tejasvi nāv-adhitaṃ astu mā vidviśāvahai
aum śāntih śāntih śāntih

- (3) vāṃ me manasi pratisthitā mano me vāci pratiṣṭhitaṃ āvīr āvīr ma edhu vedasya āniṣṭhah śrutaṃ me mā prahāsīh an nādhītena ahorātrāt sandadhāmi ṛtaṃ vadiṣyāmi satyaṃ vadiṣyāmi tan māṃ avatu tad vaktāraṃ avatu avatu māṃ avatu vaktāraṃ

- (4) aum śāntih śāntih śāntih
īśvarānugrahād eva puruṣaṃ advaita-vāsanā mahād-bhaya paritrānād viprānāṃ upajāyate

Atadhūta Gītā 11

- (5) vīśvaṃ paśyati kārya-kāranataḥ śva-svāmi-sambandhataḥ
śyācāryataḥ tathāiva pitṛ-putrādyātmanā bhedataḥ svapne jāgrati vā ya eṣa puruṣo māyā-paribhṛāmītaḥ tasmai śrī guru-mūrtaye nama idam śrī dakṣiṇāmūrtaye

(Dakṣiṇāmūrti Stotra- 8)

- (6) atra sarve na paśyanti kuśalā api paṇḍitāḥ anantardṛṣṭayas tena mohitāḥ saṃsaranti ca yāvaddrstih pravṛttim tu na parityajya tisthati tāvadantardṛṣṭitāpi na syādeva katham ca na yāvannāntardṛstim eti tāvat tām na pra-paśyati antardṛṣṭir nirihā syāt sehāyāsyāḥ katham bhavet parihṛtya tu tām samyak svabhāvam upa-saṁśraya kṣanam svabhāvam āśritya nirvimarśas tatah param vimṛśya smarāṇa-dvārā tato vetsi samastakam asaṁvedya suvedyam ca tadevam tattvam ucyate viditvaivam avedyam ca prāpnuyāt amṛtām sthitim.

Tripurā Rahasya: Ch. XV. pp. 92-98

- (7) ādarśanagaraprakhyam jagadetaccarācaram tadrūpaikatvatatastatra nottamādhama-bhāvanā apare tu svarūpe hi kalpitā mukhyatā na hi tasmāt prājña upāsita param rūpam hi niṣkalam asamarthah sthūlarūpam yadbuddhau saṅgataṁ drdham tadupāsya hetutastu śreyaḥ prāpnotyanuttamām nānyathāsyā gatih kvāpi bhaved-vai koti-janmabhīh

Tripurā Rahasya: Ch. VII. pp. 92-94

- (8) sa hovāca

na vā are patyuh kāmāya patih priyo bhavati.
 ātmanas tu kāmāya patih priyo bhavati na vā are jāyāyai kāmāya jāyā priyā bhavati.
 ātmanas tu kāmāya jāyā priyā bhavati na vā are putrāṇām kāmāya putrāḥ priyā bhavanti.
 ātmanas tu kāmāya putrāḥ priyā bhavanti na vā are cittasya kāmāya cittam priyam bhavati.
 ātmanas tu kāmāya cittam priyam bhavati.
 na vā are brahmanaḥ kāmāya brahma priyam bhavati.
 ātmanastu kāmāya brahma priyam bhavati.
 na vā are ksatrasya kāmāya kṣatram priyam bhavati.
 ātmanas tu kāmāya kṣatram priyam bhavati.
 na vā are lokānām kāmāya lokāḥ priyā bhavanti.
 ātmanas tu kāmāya lokāḥ priyā bhavanti.
 na vā are devānām kāmāya devāḥ priyā bhavanti.
 ātmanas tu kāmāya devāḥ priyā bhavanti na vā are bhūtānām kāmāya bhūtāni priyāni bhavanti.
 ātmanas tu kāmāya bhūtāni priyāni bhavanti.
 na vā are sarvasya kāmāya sarvam priyam bhavati.
 ātmanas tu kāmāya sarvam priyam bhavati.
 ātmā vā are draṣṭavyaḥ śrotavyo mantavyo nididhyāsitavyaḥ.

Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka-Upaniṣad. 2.4.5

- (9) tasyātma-para-deheṣu satopyekamayam hi tat vijnānam paramārthosau dvaitino atathya-darśinaḥ venurandhra-vibhedena bhedaḥ sadjādi samjnitah abedha-vyāpino vāyoh tathā tasya mahātmanaḥ ekatvaṃ rūpabhedaś tu bāhya-karma pravṛttijah devādibhede pradhvaste nāstyevāvaranehi sah.

Viṣṇupurāṇa Part 2-xiv 31-33

(10) sohaṃ gantā na nāgantā naikadeśa-niketanah tvaṃ cānye ca na ca tvaṃ ca tvam nānye nāham apy ahaṃ

Viṣṇupurāṇa. Part 2, xv 25

(11) ekaṃ evaṃ idam viddhi na bhedī sakalam jagat vāsudevābhidheyasya svarūpam paramātmanah

Viṣṇupurāṇa 11. xv. 35

(12) sarva-bhūtāny abhedena dādaṛśa sa tadātmanah tathā brahmaparo muktirṇ avāpa paramām dvijah tathā tvaṃ api dharmajña tulyātma-ripu-bāndhavaḥ bhava sarvagataḥ jñānātmānamavanīpate sitanīlādibhedena yathākaṃ dṛśyate nabhaḥ bhrānta-dṛṣṭibhurātmāpi tathāikassan prthak kṛtaḥ ekas samastaḥ yadihāsti kumcit tadacyuto nāsti paraṃ tatonyat sohaṃ sa ca tvaṃ sa ca sarvaṃ etat ātmasvarūpaṃ tyaja bhedamohaṃ.

Viṣṇupurāṇa. 11. xvi 20-23

(13) yenedaṃ pūṇitaṃ sarvaṃ ātmanaivātmanātmani nirākāraṃ kathaṃ vande hy abhinnam śivam avyayam

Ādadhūta-Gītā 1 2

(14) saceha sambhavatyeva tadārthaṃ idaṃ ātatam śāstramākarmayasi cet tattvaṃ paśyasi nānyathā sampannaṃ cet tadutpannā parā nirvāna-nirvṛtiḥ anyathā śāstra-garteṣu luṭhatām bhavatām iha bhavaty akṛtrmajnānām kalpaurapi na nirvṛtiḥ aśeṣena parityāgo vāsanānām ya uttamah mokṣa ity ucyate brahman sa eva vimalakramaḥ kṣīṇāyām vāsanāyām tu ceto galatī satvaraṃ kṣīṇāyām śītasantatyām brahman himakano yathā ayam vāsanayā deho dhṛiyate bhūtapanjarah vāsanā dvividhā proktā śubhā ca malinā tathā malinā janmano hetuḥ śubhā janmavināśinī punarjanmāṅkuram tyaktvā sthitā sambhṛṣṭa bijavat dehārtham dhṛiyate jñātajneyā śuddheti-cocyate

Yoga Vāsīṣṭha Vairāgya Prakaraṇa 3 4 13

(15) sarvathā bheda-kalanam dvaitādvaitam na vidyate māyā-kāryam idaṃ bhedaṃ asti ced bāhya-bhāvanam dehoham duḥkham ced brahmāham iti niścayah hṛdaya-granthir astitve chidyate brahma-cakram saṁśaye saṁ anu prāpte brahma niścayam āśrayet anātma-rūpa-coraścet ātma-ratnasya rakṣaṇam nityānandamayam brahma kevalam sarvadā svayam.

Tejobindu-Upaniṣad. 98-102

- (16) vayasi gate kaḥ kāmavikārah śuṣke nīre kaḥ kāsārah kṣiṇe vitte kaḥ parivāro jñāte tattve kaḥ saṁsārah.

Śaṅkara

- (17) jītātmanah praśāntasya paramātmā samāhitaḥ śītosṇa-sukhaduḥkheṣu tathā mānāpamānayoh.

Bhagavad-Gītā: Ch VI-7

- (18) jñāna-vijnāna-tṛptātmā kūtastho vijitendriyah yukta ity ucyate yogī sama-loṣṭhāśma-kāncanaḥ.

Bhagavad-Gītā Ch VI-8

- (19) suhrnmitrāryudāsina
madhyastha-dveṣyabandhuṣu sādhuṣvapi ca pāpeṣu sama-buddhir-viśisyate.

Bhagavad-Gītā Ch VI-9

- (20) madhu maṇiṣye madhu jaṇiṣye madhu vakṣyāmi madhu vadiṣyāmi madhumatīm devebhyo vācam udyāsam śuśrūṣeṇyām manuṣyebhyah tam ma devā avantu śobhāyai pitaronumadantu
aum śāntiḥ śāntiḥ śāntiḥ.

Yajur-Veda-Samhita: 33

- (21) dattātreyam śivam śāntam indranīla-nibham prabhum ātma-māyā-ratam devam avadhūtam digambaram bhasmoddhūlita-sarvāṅgam jatā-jūṭa-dharam vibhum catur-bāhum udārāṅgam praphulla-kamalekṣaṇam jñāna-yoga-nidhum viśva-gurum yogi-jana-priyam bhaktānukampinam sarva-sākṣiṇam siddha-sevitam evam yah satatam dhyāyed devadevam sanātanam sa muktaḥ sarva-pāpebhyo niśśreyasam avāpnuyāt ity aum satyam ity upaniṣad.

Śāṇḍilya Upaniṣad: 3.14

121) atha kasmāḍ ucyate dattātreyāṁ iti? yasmāt suduś caram tīpāḥ tapyamānīva Atraye putrakāmāya atitarām tustena bhagavatā j̄yotir mayena ātmaiva datto yasmād vā Anasūvām atreḥ tanayah abhavat tasmād ucyate Dattātreyā it̄

Śāṇḍilya-Upaniṣad 3 2

122) athāsva devasya ātma śakti kṛḍasya bhaktānukāmpino Dattātreyā rūpī su rūpā tanur avāsā indīvara dala-prakhyā catur bāhuh aghorāpāpa kāsini tad idam asya sakala nīśkalam rūpam

Śāṇḍilya-Upaniṣad 3 1

123) m̄heśvarah j̄nānamayena tapasā cīyamāno akāmavata bahu syām prajāyeya it̄ athaitasmāttapy amānāt satyakāmāt trīnyaksirāṇi ajāyanta tistro vyāhṛtayah tṛpadā gāvatri trayo vedāḥ trayo devāḥ trayo varnāḥ trayo agnayaśca jāyante yo 'sau devo bhagavān sarvasvarya sampannah sarva vyāpī sarva bhūtānam hrdaye sannī-viṣṭah m̄yāvi
m̄yayā kṛḍati sa brahmā sa viśnuh sa rudrah sa indrah sa sarve devāḥ sarvāṇi bhūtāni sa eva purastāt sa eva prścīt sa evottarataḥ sa eva daksinataḥ sa evādhastāt sa evopariśṭhāt sa eva sarvaṁ athāśya devasya dattātreyārūpā

Śāṇḍilya-Upaniṣad 3 1

124) tasmād ucyate dattātreyā it̄ atha yo asya niruktaṁ it̄ veda sarvaṁ veda atha yo ha vai vidyayā enam paraṁ upīste soham it̄ sa brahma vid bhavati

Śāṇḍilya-Upaniṣad 3 2

125) aum namo bhagavate dattātreyāya

Dattātreyā-Upaniṣad

126) aum namah śivāya it̄y upaniṣad

Dattātreyā-Upaniṣad 2 2

127) n̄rāyaṇīk īraṁ dattātreyam

Dattātreyā-Upaniṣad

128) brahmā n̄rāyaṇam kīṁ tārakam tanno brūhi bhagavā it̄ uktah satyānanda cid ātmakam sātvikam
m̄imikam dhāma upāsya it̄y āha sadā dattoham asmi it̄ . .
nārāyaṇam dattātreyam dhyātvā tadetat tārakam bhavati tadev opāsitaḥ vyajneyam garbhādi tāraṇam

Dattātreyā-Upaniṣad 1

129) kīṁtaṁ padm īraṁsthūṁ śāsīdhara-mukutaṁ.

Śiva karaca Dhyāna-Sloka

(31) śāntākāram bhujaga-śayanam padmanābham sureśam.

Viṣṇu-sahasra-nāma: Dhyāna-śloka

(32) saḥ puruṣaḥ . . . dṛṣṭimātreṇa mokṣadam veśam ādadhe.

Mudgala-Upaniṣad: 2

(33) rūpaṁ iti gandharvāḥ tam yathā yathopāsate tathaiva bhavati. tasmāt brāhmaṇaḥ puruṣarūpaṁ param brahmaiva aham itī bhāvayet. tadrūpo bhavati

Mudgala-Upaniṣad. 3

(34) prakṛtyā sahitaḥ śyāmaḥ

Rāmapūrvatāpini-Upaniṣad. 4.7

(35) śyāmaṁ . . . śuddha-sphaṭika saṁkāśam kevalam mokṣa-kāṅksayā cintayan paramātmānam . . . kālāmbhodhara—kānti-kāntam anīśam . . . rāghavam ujvalāṅgam bhaje.

Rāmarahasya-Upaniṣad: 4 5

(36) prabhuṁ vareṇyam pītaram maheśam yo brahmāṇam vidadhāti tasmai vedānś ca sarvān prahiṇoti cāgryam tam vai prabhuṁ pītaram devatānām.

Śarabha-Upaniṣad: 2

(37) tad viṣṇoḥ paramam padam sadā paśyanti sūrayaḥ.

Muktika-Upaniṣad: concluding statement.

(38) ātmaiva siddhaḥ advītiyaḥ mātātā hi anyad iva . . .
eṣā māyā sva-vyatiriktāni . . . darśayitvā . . . māyā ca avidyā ca svayam eva bhavati . . . saīśa citrā sudṛḍhā . . .
caitanya-diptā.

Nṛsiṁhottaratāpany-Upaniṣad: 9

(39) māyā nāma anādirantavati.
pramāṇāpramāna sādharmaṇā na satī nāsati na sadasati svayamadhikā vikārarahitā nirūpyamāṇā satitaralakṣaṇaśūnyā sā māyetyucyate.

Sarvasāra-Upaniṣad: 1

(40) īśvarasya mahāmāyā tadājnā-vaśa-vartinī tatsamkalpānusārīṇī

Tripādvibhūti-mahā-nārāyaṇa-Upaniṣad

(41) aum īśānaḥ sarva-vidyānām īśvaraḥ sarva-bhūtānām brahmādhipatiḥ brahmaṇodhipatiḥ brahmā śivo mestu sadāśivoṁ.

Yajur-Veda.

“(1) māvā sā trividhā proktā satva rājasa tāmāsī

Yājñatalkya Upanisad

“(2) yā ca prāg ātmano māvā tathānte ca tīraskṛtā brahmanāḍibhir udgītā sā māveti vivekatah māvā tatkārya vilāye nesvaratvam najivatā tatah buddha cidevābha

Varūla Upanisad 2 51-52

“(3) aum sarva-cantanva rūpanā tām ādvām vidyām ca dhūmahī buddhim yā nah pracodayāt

Deī-Bhūgaṇata 1 1

“(4) vasmin bhāvāh prahante lināścāvyaktatām yayuh paśvanti vyaktatām bhūvo jāvante budbudā iva ksetrajnādhusthitam cāva kāranair vidvate punah evam sa bhagavān devam paśyanti anye punahpunah brahma brahmety athāvanti ye vidur brāhmanās tathā atrasa te līyam vānti linīs cāvyaaktaśālinah lināścāvyaktaśālinah

(Mārtrika-Upanisad 18)

“(5) yah sarvo paramē kāle sarvān ātmanī upasamhṛtya svātmānande sukhe modate prakāśate vā sa devah

Dakṣiṇāmūrti-Upanisad 1

“(6) tattvam asi aham brahmāsmi sarvam khalv idam brahma neha nīnāsti kiṁ ca na itvādi mahāvakyārthānubhava jnānāt brahmanā aham asmiti niscitya nirvikalpaka samādhinā svatantrah yatīś carati sa sanvāsī.
sa muktah sa pūjyah sa yogī sa paramahamāsah sa avadhūtah sa brāhmanah iti

Nirālamba Upanisad

“(7) evam cira samādhī jñāta brahmāmṛta pāna parāvanosau carinvāsī paramā hamsah avadhūto bhavati tad darśanena sakalūh jagat pavitrah bhavati tatsevā puro ajnopi mukto bhavati tattkulam ekottara satam tāravati tasmāt pitṛ jāvāpṛva vargam ca muktaḥ bhavatīty upanisad

Maṇḍala Brāhmana Upanisad Concluding paragraph

“(8) aum athāha sūmkrūh bhagavāntam avadhūtam Dattātreyam paricariet, a papṛechā ko avadhūtah? tam hovāca bhagavo dattātreyah paramā kīrunikah aksaravāt virenyati it dhūta samāsāra-bandhanāt tatvamsyādihikṣvatiāt avadhūta itīvati

Avadhūta Upanisad 1

- (60) cinmyam paramānanda brahmaiva aham iti smaran. . . .
 āśā-nivṛtto bhūtvā āśāmbara-dharo bhūtvā sarvadā mano-vāk-kāya-karmabhiḥ sarva-saṁsāraṁ utsrjya prapancāvānmukhaḥ svarūpānusandhānena bhramara-kīṭa-nyāyena mukto bhavati ity upaniṣad.

Nārada-parivṛjaka-Upaniṣad: 5 after 38

- (61) parama-haṁsaḥ . . . bhasmoddhūlana-parah sarva-tyāgī. . . .
 deha-mātrāvaśiṣṭaḥ dig-ambaraḥ . . . avadhūtas tu aniyamaḥ.

Sanyāsa-Upaniṣad: 13

- (62) sa etaṁ Bhusuṇḍaḥ Kālāgni-rudraṁ agamat. āgatya bho vibhūteḥ mātmyam brūhi . . . mukti-śrutim mamopadeśam kuruṣveti. aum tatheti. sadyojātāt pṛthvī. tasyāḥ syāt nivṛttiḥ. tasyāḥ kapila-varṇā nandā tad-gomayena vibhūtir jātā. vāmadevāt udakaṁ. tasmāt pratiṣṭhā.
 tasyāḥ kṛṣṇa-varṇā bhadra tad-gomayena bhasitaṁ jātam.
 aghorāt vahniḥ tasmād vidyā tasyā rakta-varṇā surabhiḥ. tad-gomayena bhasma jātam. tatpurusāt vāyuḥ.
 tasmāt śāntiḥ. tasyāḥ sveta-varṇā suśīlā. tasyāḥ gomayena kṣāraṁ jātam. īśānād ākāśam tasmād śāntyatītā. tasyāḥ citra-varṇā sumanāḥ. tad gomayena rakṣā jātā.
 vibhūtir bhasitaṁ bhasma kṣāraṁ rakṣeti bhasmano bhavanti panca nāmāni. pancabhiḥ nāmabhiḥ bhṛśam aiśvarya-kāranātbhūtiḥ. bhasma sarvāgha-bhakṣaṇāt.
 bhāsanat bhasitaṁ kṣāraṇād āpadām kṣāraṁ. bhūta-pretapiśāca-brahmarākṣasa-apasmāra bhavabhītibhyo abhirakṣaṇāt rakṣeti. . . .

Bṛhad-jābāla-Upaniṣad: 1

- (63) ye māṁ rudraṁ ca rudrāṇīm gayatrim veda-mātaraṁ vetsyanti. . . .
 teṣāṁ śivaś ca saumyaś ca bhavisyāmi sadaiva hi.

Linga-Mahā-Purāṇa: Pūrva-Bhāga: 23.17-24

- (64) agnir yathaiko bhuvanaṁ praviṣṭhaḥ rūpaṁ rūpaṁ prati-rūpo babhūva ekaṁ bhasma sarva-bhūtāntarātmā rūpaṁ rūpaṁ prati-rūpo bahisca agni-somātmakaṁ viśvaṁ ity agnirācakṣate roudrī ghorā yā taijasi tanuḥ somaḥ śaktyamṛta-mayaḥ śaktikarī tanuḥ amṛtaṁ yat-pratiṣṭhā sā tejo-vidyā-kalā-svayaṁ sthūla-sūkṣmeṣu bhūtesu sa eva rasa tejasi dvi-vidhā tejaso vṛttiḥ sūryātmā-ca analātmikā tathaiva-rasa-śaktiś ca somātmā-ca analātmikā vaidyud-ādi-mayaṁ tejo madhurādi-mayo rasaḥ.

tejo-rasa-vibhedais tu vṛttam etat carācaṛam agner amṛta niṣpattiḥ amṛtena agnir edhate ata eva havih klptam agni somātmakam jagat ūrdhva śakti-mayam soma adho-śakti-mayo analah tābhyām sampuṭitah tasmāt śaśvad viśvam idam jagat agner ūrdhvam bhavaty esa yāvat saumyam parāmṛtam yāvad agny-ātmakam saumyam amṛtam viṣjaty adhah ata eva hi kālāgniḥ adhastāt śaktir ūrdhvagā yāvad ādahanaścordhvam adhastāt pāvanam bhavet ādhāra-śaktyavadhṛtah kālāgnir ayam ūrdhvagah tathaiva nūnagas somah śiva-śakti-padāspadah śivaścordhvamayaś śaktiḥ ūrdhva-śakti-mayaś śivah tad ittham śiva śaktibhyām nāvyaṣṭam iha kiṁ ca na asakṛc ca agninā dagdham jagat tad-bhasmasāt kṛtam agner vīryam idam prāhuḥ tad-vīryam bhasma yat tatah yaścettham bhasma sadbhāvam jñātvābhīṣnāti bhasmanā agnir ity ādibhiḥ mantraiḥ dagdha-pāpas sa ucyate agner vīryam ca tad bhasma somenāplāvitam punah ayoga-yuktyā prakṛter adhikārāya kalpate yoga-yuktyā tu tad bhasma plāvyamānam samantatah śaktena amṛta-varṣena hy adhikārān nivartate ato mṛtyunjayaḍyettham amṛta-plāvanam satām śiva-śakty-amṛta-sparśe labdha eva kuto mṛtiḥ yo veda gahanam guhyam pāvanamca tathoditam agni-soma-putam kṛtvā na sa bhūyobhi-jāyate śivāgninā tanum dagdhvā śakti-somāmṛtena yah plāvayed yogamārgena somṛtatvāya kalpate somṛtatvāyakalpata iti

Bṛhad-jābāla-Upaniṣad. 2

- (11) vidyā-śaktiḥ samastānām śaktir ity abhidhiyate guna-trayaśrayā vidyā sā vidyā ca tad-āśrayā guna-trayam idam dhenuḥ vidyābhūd gomayam śubham mūtrancopaniṣat proktam kuryād bhasma tatah param.

Bṛhad-jābāla-Upaniṣad. 3

- (12) mānastokena mantrena mantritam bhasma dhārayet
 brāhmanah kṣatriyah tathā traivarnikānām sarveṣām
 . . . gṛhasthānām . . . brahma-cārinā . . . śūdrānām . . . anyeṣām api sarveṣām . . . yatnām . . . atī-varnāśramānām sarveṣām . . . bhasma . . .
 tenādhītam śrutam tena tena sarvam anuṣṭhitam yena viprena śirasī tripundram bhasmanā dhṛtam tyakta-varnāśramācāro lupta-sarvakriyopi yah śakṛt tiryak-pundrāṅka-dhāranāt sopi pūjyate ye bhasma-dhāranam tyaktvā karma kurvanti mānavāḥ teṣām nāsti munir-mokṣah saṁsārāt janma-koṭibhiḥ . . .
 rudrāgneḥ yat param vīryam tad bhasma pari kṛtitam tasmāt sarveṣu kāleṣu vīryavān bhasma-saṁyutaḥ bhasma-niṣṭhasya dāhyante doṣā bhasmāgni saṅgamāt bhasma-snāna--viśuddhātmā bhasma-niṣṭha iti smṛtaḥ bhasma-sandigdha-sarvāṅgaḥ bhasma-dīpta-tripuṇḍrakaḥ bhasma śāyī ca puruṣaḥ bhasma-niṣṭha iti smṛtaḥ.

Bṛhad-jābāla-Upaniṣad: 5

(67) atha Jābālaḥ Bhusuṇḍaḥ kailāsa-śikharāvāsam aurīkāra-svarūpīnam mahādevaṁ . . . bhasmoddhūlita-vigrahaṁ tiryak-tripuṇḍra-rekhā-virājamāna-phāla-pradeśaṁ niṣkalaṁ nir-guṇaṁ śāntaṁ advaitaṁ śivaṁ praṇamya papraccha bhagavan vedasāraṁ udhṛtya tripuṇḍra-vidhūṁ yasmād anyānapekṣam eva mokṣopalabdhiḥ. kiṁ bhasmano dravyaṁ?

Bhasmajābāla-Upaniṣad: 1

(68) evaṁ tripuṇḍra-vidhūṁ bhasmanā karoti yaḥ . . saḥ sakala-bhogān bhuṅkte. dehaṁ tyaktvā śiva-sāyujyaṁ eti.
 na sa punar āvartate na sa punar āvartate ityāha bhagavān kālāgnirudrah.

Kālāgnirudra-Upaniṣad

(69) tryakṣaṁ varadaṁ śuddhaṁ taruṇāditya-sannibhaṁ bhasmoddhūlita-sarvāṅgaṁ suprasannaṁ anusmaraṇa na tu vāyoś ca bhayaṁ bhavati yoginaḥ

Yoga-Tattva-Upaniṣad: 92, 97

(70) aurī namo bhagavate bhasmāṅga-rāgāyogra-tejase

Tripurātāpiny-Upaniṣad: 3

(71) Bhusuṇḍaḥ . . . mahādevaṁ . . . bhasmoddhūlita-vigrahaṁ . . .
 advaitaṁ . . . śivaṁ . . . praṇamya papraccha. adhīḥ bhagavan vedasāraṁ udhṛtya tripuṇḍra-vidhūṁ yasmād anyānapekṣam eva mokṣopalabdhiḥ. kiṁ bhasma no dravyaṁ?

Bhasma-jābāla-Upaniṣad: 1

(72) prakṛtyā sahitaḥ śyāmaḥ pīta-vāsā jaṭā-dharah.

Rāma-pūrva-tāpinī Upaniṣad: 3.7

(73) āsinaḥ candra-khaṇḍaḥ prati-ghaṭita-jatā-kṣīragauras trinetrah.

Dakṣiṇāmūrti-Upaniṣad: 5

(74) jñānacakṣuṣaḥ taṁ ekaṁ eva paśyanti pariśubhraṁ vibhūṁ dvijāḥ.

Mantrika-Upaniṣad: 16

(75) atasī-puspa-saṁkāśaṁ nābhi-sthāne pratisthitaṁ caturbhujam mahā-viṣṇuṁ pūrakena vicintayet.

Dhyāna-Bindu-Upaniṣad: 30

“” śankha-cakra-mahāmudrā pustakādhyam catur-bhujam saṁpūrṇa-candra-saṁkāśam hayagrīvam upāśmahe

Hayagrīva-Upaniṣad 4

“” kaḥ kṛṣṇah? . . pāpa-karsanah go-bhūmi veda-vedito gopī-jana-vidyā-kalāpa-prerakah tanmāyā ceti sakalam param brahmaiva tat yo dhyāyati rasati bhajati sa amṛto bhavati iti kim tad-rūpam? sat-pundarīkanayanam meghābharam vaidyutāmbaram—dvi-bhujam jñāna-mudrādhyam vana-mālinam-īśvaram .

Gopālapūrnatūpinī-Upaniṣad 1

“” viṣṇur-nāma mahā-yogī mahā-bhūto mahā-tapāh tattva-mārge yathā dipo dṛśyate puruṣottamah tam ārādhya jagan-nātham pranipatya pītāmahah pāpraccha yoga-tattvam me brūhi cāstānga samyutam tam uvāca hrīṣikesah vakṣyāmi śṛnu tattvatah sarve jīvāḥ sukhāḥ duḥkhāḥ māyā-jālena vestitāḥ tesāṁ mukti-karam mārgam māyā-jāla-nikṛntanam janma mṛtyu-jarā-vyādhi-nāśanam mṛtyu-tārakam nānā-mārgais tu dus-prāpam kaivalyam paramam padam patitāḥ śīstra-jālesu prajñayā tena mohitāḥ anirvācyaṁ padam vaktum na śakyam tam surair api svātma-prakāśa-rūpam tat kim śāstreṇa prakāśyate niskalam nirmalam śāntam sarvātītam nityam tadeva jīva-rūpena punya-pāpa-phalair vṛtam paramātmapadam nityam tat-katham jivatām gatām sarva-bhāva-padātītam jñāna-rūpam niranjanam vārivat sphuritam tasmīn tatrāhankṛtir utthitā pañcātmakam abhūt pinḍam dhātu-baddham guṇātmakam sukha-duḥkhaḥ samāyuktam jīva-bhāvanayā kuru tena jīvābhūdḥā proktā viśuddhāḥ paramātmāni kāma-krodha-bhayaṁ cāpi mohalobhamado-rajah janma mṛtyuś ca kārpanyam śokaś tandrā ksudhā trṣṇā trṣṇa lujjā bhayaḥ duḥkham viśādo haṛṣa eva ca ebhiḥ doṣaiḥ vinir-muktah sa jīvaḥ kevalo matah tasmād doṣa-vināśārtham upāyam kathayāmi te yoga-hīnam katham jñānam mokṣadam bhavati dhruvam yogo hi jñāna-hīnas tu na ksamo mokṣa-karman tasmāt jñānam ca yogam ca mī muksuḥ dṛḍham abhyaset

Yoga-Tattva-Upaniṣad 2-15

“” ajñānād eva saṁsāro jñānād eva vimucyate jñāna-svarūpam-evādaḥ jñānam jñeyaka-sādhnam jñātām jena nijaṁ rūpam kaivalyam paramam padam niskalam nirmalam sāksāt sac-cidānanda-rūpakam utpatti-sthiti-samhāra-sphūrti-jñāna-vivarjitam etad jñānam iti proktam

Yoga-Tattva-Upaniṣad. 16-18

(70) jñānam nāma utpatti-vināśa-rahitaṁ nairantaryaṁ caitanyaṁ jñānam ity ucyate.

Sarva-Sāra-Upaniṣad: 0.0

(71) atha yogaṁ bravīmi te yogo hi bahudhā brahman bhidyate vyavahārataḥ mantrayogo layaścaiva haṭhosau rājayogataḥ ārambhaś ca ghataś caiva tathā paricayaḥ smṛtaḥ niṣpattiścetyavasthā ca sarvatra parikīrtitā eteṣāṁ lakṣaṇaṁ brahman vaksye śrunu samāsataḥ mātrkādi-yutaṁ mantraṁ dvādaśābdaṁ tu yo japeṭ kramena labhate jñānam aṇimādi-guṇānvitaṁ alpabuddhir-imaṁ yogaṁ sevate sādhakādhamāḥ layayogaḥ citta-layaḥ kotīśaḥ parikīrtitaḥ gacchan tiṣṭhan svapan bhunjan dhyāyan niṣkalaṁ īśvaraṁ sa eva layayogas syāt haṭha-yogam śṛṇu yamaś ca niyamaś caiva āśanaṁ prāṇa-samīyamaḥ pratyāhāre dhāraṇā ca dhyānaṁ bhrū-madhyame harim samādhiḥ samatāvasthā śaṣṭhāṅgo yoga ucyate tato bhaved rāja-yogo nāntarā bhavati dhruvaṁ yadā tu rāja-yogena niṣpannā yogibhiḥ kṛiyā tadā viveka-vairāgyam jāyate yogino dhruvaṁ viṣṇur-nāma mahā-yogī mahā-bhūto mahā-tapāḥ tattva-mārge yathā dīpo dṛśyate puruṣottamaḥ tena sarvaṁ idaṁ protam tat satyaṁ tat paraṁ padaṁ labhate yoga-yuktātmā puruṣaḥ tat paraṁ padaṁ.

Yoga-Tattva-Upaniṣad: 2-24, 131, 136

(72) parama-gurūpadeśena . . . buddhi-guhānīhita-jyotirvā . . .
turiya-caitanyaṁ vā antar-lakṣyaṁ bhavati. tad darśanaṁ sadācārya-mūlam ācāryo veda-saṁpanno viṣṇu-bhaktō vimatsaraḥ yoga-jno yoga-niṣṭhaśca sadā yogātmakaḥ śuciḥ guru-bhakti-samāyuktaḥ puruṣa-jno viśeṣataḥ evam lakṣaṇa-saṁpannaḥ gurur-ity-abhidhīyate gu-śabdas tv andhakāras syāt ru-śabdaḥ tan-nirodhakaḥ andhakāra-nirodhitvāt gurur ity abhidhīyate gurur eva paraṁ brahma gurur eva parā gatiḥ gurur eva parā vidyā gurur eva parāyaṇaṁ gurur eva parā kāṣṭhā gurur eva paraṁ dhanaṁ yasmāt tad-upadeṣṭāsau tasmād gurutaro guruh iti yaḥ sakṛd uccārayati tasya saṁsāra-mocanaṁ bhavati sarva-janma-kṛtaṁ pāpaṁ tat-kṣaṇād eva naśyati sarva-kāmaṁ avāpnoti. sarva-puruṣārtha-siddhir bhavati ya evaṁ veda. ity upaniṣad.

Advaya-tāraka-Upaniṣad: Concluding paragraph

(73) atha khalu soṁyemaṁ sanātanaṁ ātma-dharmaṁ vaiṣṇaviṁ niṣṭhaṁ nāsamāpya prabrūyāt nānūcānamnāya nānātmavide nāvitarāgāya nāviśuddhāya nānupasannāya nāprayatamānasā ya iti ha smāhuh tad etat ṛcābhyuktaṁ vidyā ha vai brāhmanam ājagāma gopāya mām śevadhisteḥaṁ asmi asūyakāyānṛjave śathāya mā brūyāh vīryavati tathā syām yaṁ eva vidyā śrutam apramattam medhāvinam brahmacāryopapannam-asmā imām upasannāya samyak parikṣya dadyāt vaiṣṇavīm ātmanīsthām adhyāpitā ye gurum nādnīyante viprā vācā manasā karmanā vā yathaiḥ tena na guruh bhojanīyah tathaiḥ cānnaṁ na bhunakti śrutam tat. gurur eva paro dharmo gurur eva parā gatih ekākṣara-pradātāram yo gurum nābhinandati tasya śrutam tathā jñānam sravaty āmaghatāmbuvat yasya deve parā bhaktih yathā deve tathā gurau sa brahma-vit param preyāditi vedānuśāsanaṁ ity upaniṣad.

Sāthyañāya-Upaniṣad: 33-37

“¹¹ dīpākāram mahādevam jvalantam nābhi-madhyame abhisiṣya amṛtenaiva 'hamṣa' 'hamsa' ity yo jayet jarā-marana-roḡādī na tasya bhuvi vidyate īśvaratvam avāpnoti sadābhyāsa-rataḥ pumān hamsa-vidyām ṛte loka nāsti nityatva-sādhanaṁ yo dadāti mahā-vidyām hamsākhyām pārameśvarīm tasya dāsyam sadā kuryāt prajñayā parayā saha śubham vā aśubham anyad vā yaduktam gurunā bhuvi tat kuryād avicārena śisyah samtoṣa-samyutah hamsa-vidyām imām labdhvā guru-śuśrūṣayā narah gurur eva hams sākṣāt nānyah ity abravīt śrutih

Brahma-Vidyā-Upaniṣad. 23-31

“¹² bhagavan śariraṁ idaṁ maithunādevodbhūtam samvid-apetam nīraya eva . . . malaiḥ bahubhiḥ paripūrnam etādrśe śarīre vartamānasya bhagavānīstvam no gatīnti . . sa hovāca mahādevam

.

deho devālayah proktaḥ sa jīvaḥ kevalaḥ śivaḥ tyajed ajñāna-nirmālyaṁ sohaṁ bhāvena pūjayet . . .
 ahamasmi paraś cāsmi brahmāsmi prabhavoṣmi ahaṁ . . .
 sarva-loka-guruś cāsmi sarva-lokosmi sosmy-aham ahaṁ-evāsmi siddhosmi śuddhosmi paramosmy aham ahaṁ asmi sadā sosmi nityosmi vimalosmy aham vijñānosmi viśeṣosmi somosmi sakalosmy ahaṁ śubhosmi śoka-hīnosmi caitanyosmi samosmy ahaṁ rūpāvamāna-hīnosmi nirgunosmi śivosmy ahaṁ.

Maitreyī-Upaniṣad. 1.3; 2. 1; 1-4)

“¹³ jñātī-jñāna-jneyānām āvirbhāva tirobhāva jñātā svayaṁ āvirbhāva tirobhāva rahitaḥ svayaṁ jyotiḥ sāksityucyate

Sara-Sāra-Upaniṣad: 1

- (77) yadā pasyati cātmānam kevalam paramārthataḥ
māyāmātram jagatkṛtsnam tadā bhavati nirvṛtiḥ

Jābāla-Darśana-Upaniṣad: 10-12

- (78) tripurānanta-śaktyaika-rūpini sarva-sākṣini
sā citiḥ sarvataḥ pūrṇā pariccheda-vivarjanāt.

Tripurā-Rahasya: Jñānakāṇḍa: 11-45

- (79) pratibimba-svarūpajñāḥ pratibimbam pracakṣate jagat etādrśam sarvaiḥ samabhīlakṣitam svato na bhāsate kvāpi bhāsate ca cidāśrayāt ato jagat syād ādarśa-pratibimba-su-sammitam.

Tripurā-Rahasya: Jñānakāṇḍa: 11.60-61

- (80) viśvam darpana-drśyamāna-nagarī-tulyam nijāntargatam paśyann-ātmanī māyayā bahirivodbhūtam yathā nidrayā yah sākṣāt-kurute prabodha samaye svātmānam evādvayam
tasmai śrī gurumūrtaye nama idam śrī dakṣiṇāmūrtaye.

Dakṣiṇāmūrti-Stotra: 2

- (81) iśvarānugrahād eva puṁsām advaita-vāsanā.

Avadhūta-Gītā: 1

- (82) param brahma pūrṇam advayam.

Adhyātma-Upaniṣad: 21

- (83) aum iti vyāharet aum namo bhagavate dattātreyāya smarana-mātra-saṁtuṣṭāya mahā-bhaya-nivāraṇāya mahā-jñāna-pradāya cidānandātmāne bālonmatta-piśāca-vesāyeti mahā-yogine avadhūtāyeti anasūyānanda-vardhanāya atri-putrāyeti sarvakāma-phala-pradāya aum iti vyāharet. bhava-bandha-mocanāyeti hrīm iti vyāharet. sakala-vibhūti dāyeti krom iti vyāharet sādhyākarsaṇāyeti saur iti vyāharet. sarva-maṇaḥ-ksobhanāyeti śrīm iti vyāharet.
mahom iti vyāharet. ciraṁjīvine vasad iti vyāharet vaśikuru vaśikuru vaṣad iti vyāharet. ākarsaya ākarṣaya hum iti vyāharet. vidvesaya vidveṣaya phaḍ iti vyāharet uccāṭayoccātaya ṭhatheti vyāharet.
staṁbhaya staṁbhaya khakheti vyāharet. mārāya mārāya namaḥ saṁpannāya namaḥ saṁpannāya svāhā poṣaya poṣaya.
para-mantra para-yantra para-tantrāmś chindhi chindhi grahān nivārāya nivārāya dāridryam vidrāvaya vidrāvaya vyādhim nivārāya nivārāya duḥkham haraya haraya deham posaya posaya cittam toṣaya toṣayeti sarva-mantra-sarva-yantra-sarva-tantra-sarva-pallava-svarūpāyeti aum namaḥ śivāya. ity upaniṣad.

Dattātreyā-Upaniṣad: 2

(11) sarvopetā ca tad-darśanāt

Brahma-Sūtra 2 1 30

(12) sarva śakti yuktā ca parā devatā ityabhy upagantavyam kutah? tad-darśanāt tathā hi darśayati śrutih sarva śakti yogam parasyāḥ devatāyāḥ

Śankara-Bhāṣya 2 1 30

(13) gurur brahmā gurur viśnuḥ gurur eva maheśvarah gurus sāksāt param brahma tasmai śrī gurave namah

Guru-Stotra

(14) vandāru jana mandāram svānandāmbudhim advayaṁ vande datta prabhuṁ devaṁ samsāra-bhrama-vārahaṁ

Guru Caritam

(15) aum sarva-caitanya-rūpaṁ tām ādyāṁ vidyāṁ ca dhimahi buddhiṁ yā nah pracodayāt

Devī-Bhāgavata 1 1

(16) jīvataḥ puruṣasya kartṛtva-bhoktṛtva sukha duḥkhādi-lakṣaṇaś citta dharmah kleśa-rūpatvāt bandho bhavati tasya nivāraṇaṁ jīvan-muktiḥ

Vidyāraṇya's Jīvanmukti-Vitēka Ch 1 p 9

(17) natatra sūryo bhāti na candra-tārakaṁ nemā vidyuto bhānti kutoyaṁ agniḥ tam eva bhāntaṁ anubhāti sarvaṁ tasya bhāṣā sarvaṁ idaṁ vibhāti

Katha Upaniṣad 2 5 15

(18) tad viśnoḥ paramaṁ padaṁ sadā paśyanti sūrayaḥ

Paingala-Upaniṣad

(19) bhargo devasya dhimahi (Yajurveda-Samhitā 1 5) ekaṁ evādvitīyaṁ brahma (Chāndogya-Upaniṣad 6 2 1) Śankara interprets this as sajītiya vijītiya svagata bheda-varjitaṁ brahma

(20) sarvaṁ khalv idaṁ brahma

(21) neha nānāsti kiṁ ca na

Katha Upaniṣad 2 4 11

(22) manasaṁ ānu draṣṭavyaṁ

Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka-Upaniṣad 4 4 19

(23) naita vācā na manasā prāptuṁ śakyo na caksusā

Katha Upaniṣad 2 6 12

- (97) idam adya mayā labdham idam prāpsyē manoratham
ity ajnāna-vimohitāḥ

Bhagavad-Gītā: 16 13-15

- (98) yadā samharate cāyam kūrmoṅgānīva sarvaśaḥ
indriyāṇindriyārthebhyaḥ tasya prajñā pratiṣṭhitā.

Bhagavad-Gītā: 2 58

- (99) yadā pancāvatisthante jñānāni manasā saha
buddhiś ca naviceṣṭate tām āhuh paramām gatim.

Kaṭha-Upaniṣad: 2.6-10

- (100) tatra ko mohaḥ kaś śokaḥ ekatvam anupaśyataḥ.

Īśāvāsyopaniṣad: 7

- (101) śārīram kevalam karma kurvan nāpnoti kilbiṣam

Bhagavad-Gītā: 4.21

- (102) yaḥ sarvatrānabhisnehah tat tat prāpya śubhāśubham
nābhinandati na dveṣṭi tasya prajñā pratiṣṭhitā

Bhagavad-Gītā: 2 57

- (103) śārīra-yātrāpi ca te na prasidhyet akarmaṇaḥ

Bhagavad-Gītā: 3 8

- (104) pratibodha viditam.

Kena-Upaniṣad: 12

- (105) tad eva brahma tvam viddhi nedaṁ yad idam upāsate.

Kena-Upaniṣad: 1.8

- (106) yo mām paśyati sarvatra sarvaṁ ca mayi paśyati
tasyāham na praṇaśyāmi sa ca me na pranaśyati

Bhagavad-Gītā: 6 30

- (107) sādhibhūtādhidaivam mām . . ye viduḥ yukta-cetasāḥ.

Bhagavad-Gītāś 7.30

- (108) deho devālayaḥ proktaḥ.

Maitreyī-Upaniṣad: 2.1

- (109) nāyam hanti na hanyate.

Kaṭhopaniṣad: 1.2 19

- (110) cit-svarūpoham iti sadā bhāvayan . . . antar-dṛṣṭyā . . .
param brahma avalokayan tad-rūpo bhavati.

Advayatāraka-Upaniṣad: 0.0

- (111) haṁsātmānam dhyāyet . . . param brahma bhavet . . . tasmin
. . . sadāśivaḥ . . . prakāśate.

Haṁsa-Upaniṣad: 2.

- (iii) na sandr̥ṣe tiṣṭhati rūpaṁ asya na cakṣusā paśyati kaścanainam hṛdā hṛdistham manasā ya evaṁ viduḥ amṛtās te bhavanti

Śvetāśvatara-Upaniṣad 4 20

- (iii) manasa-vedam āptavyam neha nānāsti kiṁcana

Katha-Upaniṣad. 2 4.11

- (iii) yogi niyata-mānasah . śāntim nīrvāna-paramāṁ
mat-saṁsthāṁ adbhūgacchati

Bhagavad-Gītā 6 15

- (iii) brahma-veda brahmaiva bhavati

(Mundaka-Upaniṣad 3 2 9)

- (iii) teṣāṁ sukhaṁ śāśvataṁ netaresāṁ teṣāṁ śāntiḥ śāśvati netareṣāṁ.

Katha-Upaniṣad. 2 5.12

- (iii) haṁsah ṛṣiḥ . . . parama haṁsah devatā . .

Hamsa-Upaniṣad. 2

- (iii) vāg-arthāṁ iva saṁpṛktau vāg-ārtha pratipattaye
jagataḥ pitarau vande pārvatī-parameśvarau.

Raghuvamśa: 1-1

- (iii) sa eva māyā parimohitātmā śarīraṁ āsthāya karoti sarvaṁ . . . stṛy annapānādi vicitra-bhogaiḥ sa eva jāgrat paritṛptiṁ eti . . . svapne sa jīvaḥ sukhaduḥkha bhoktā śva-māyayā kalpita jīva-loke susupti-lāle sakale vilīne tamobhūbhūtaḥ sukha-rūpaṁ eti . . .
ādhāraṁ ānandaṁ akhaṇḍa-bodhaṁ yasmin layaṁ yāti puratrayaṁ ca . . . tad brahmādvayaṁ asmy aham.

Kaivalya-Upaniṣad 1 12.19

- (iii) dvāsuparnā sayujā sakhāyā samānaṁ vṛksam pariśasvajāte
tayoranyaḥ pippalaṁ svādu attī anaśnan anyo abhicākaśīti

Mundaka-Upaniṣad. 3 1 1

- (iii) yogah citta-vṛtti-nirodhaḥ

Paṭanjali-Sūtra. 1 2

- (iii) Dattātreyo mahonmattaḥ

Dattātreyā-Stotra

- (iii) mahimnaḥ pāraṁ te parama-viduṣo yady asadr̥ṣī stutir brahmādināṁ api tadavasannas tvayi girah sthāi ācyāḥ sarvāḥ śva-mati-parināmāvadhi gṛhaṁ inimāpy eṣa stotro hara nīrapavādaḥ parikaraḥ.

Śiva-Mahimnaḥ Stotra: 1

- (124) Dattātreyā hare kṛṣṇa unmattānanda-dāyaka
digambara muner-bāla piśāca-jñāna-sāgara.

Dattātreyā-Upaniṣad: 11

- (125) bhṛgurvai vāruṇiḥ varuṇam pitarām upasasāra.
adhīhi bhagavo brahmeti tasmā etat provāca.
annam prānam cakṣuḥ śrotram manovācam iti tam hovāca.
yato vā imāni bhūtāni jāyante. yena jātāni jīvanti.
yatprayantya bhisamviśanti tad vijijnāsasva.
tad brahmeti. sa tapo tapyata. sa tapastaptvā.

annam brahmeti vyajānāt annādhyeva khalv-imāni bhūtāni jāyante. annena jātāni jīvanti. annam prayantya bhisamviśanti tad vijijnāya. punareva varuṇam pitarām upasasāra adhīhi bhagavo brahmeti.
tam hovāca. tapasā brahma vijijnāsasva tapo brahmeti.

Taittirīya-Upaniṣad: 3 1-2

- (126) śivaś cordhvamayaś-śaktiḥ ūrdhvaśaktimayaś śivah
tad itthaṁ śiva-śaktibhyām nāvyāptam iha kimcana asakṛc cāgninā dagdham jagat tat-bhasmasāt kṛtam agner vīryam idam prāhuḥ tad vīryam bhasma yattataḥ.

(Brhajjābāla-Upaniṣad: 2 9-10)

- (127) yasyāmatam tasya matam.

Kena-Upaniṣad: 2.2

- (128) kṛpālurakṛtadrohaḥ titikṣuḥ sarva-dehinām
sātya-sāro 'navadyātmā samassarvopakāraḥ.

Avadhūta-Gītā: VII.4

- (129) . . . āgamah . . . pramānam sarvatodhikam adṛṣṭārtheṣu samvādāt pramānam hyāgamo bhavet.

tasmāt sarvajña gadito hyāgamah sarvadarśanaḥ tatrokto deva evādaḥ śṛṣṭeḥ jagata āsthitaḥ nirupādāna evādaḥ sṛṣṭavānakhilam jagat yasmānmaheśvaraḥ pūrṇaḥ svaccha-svātantrya-samyutaḥ.

(Tripurā-Rahasya: Jñānakāṇḍa: Ch. 11-23, 34, 36, 37)

- (130) īśvarānugrahād eva puṁsām advaita-vāsanā mahadbhaya-paritrāṇād viprāṇām upajāyate.

Avadhūta-Gītā: 1.1

- (131) īśānas sarva-vidyānām īśvaras sarva-bhūtānām brahmādhīpatiḥ brahmaṇodhipatiḥ brahmā śivo mestu sadāśivoṁ.

Yajur-Veda

111) icchāmātram prabhossṛṣṭih.

Mandukya-Upaniṣad

112) matprasādāt tarīṣyasi.

Bhagavad-Gītā 18 58

113) mahāntarī vibhūrī ātmānārī matvā-dhīro na śocati.

Kaṭha-Upaniṣad: 1 2 21

114) śānto dāntah uparatah titiksuh samāhito bhūtvā ātmanyevātmānārī paśyet.

Bṛhad-Āranyaka Upaniṣad: 4 4 23

parīksya lokān karmacitān brāhmano nirvedam jyāt . . tad vijnānārtham sa gurum evābhigacchet samit-pānīh śrotriyam brahma-nistham

Mundaka-Upaniṣad 1 2 12

115) yenedam pūrītarī sarvam ātmanaivātmanātmanā nirākāram katham vande hy abhinnam śivam avyayam

Avadhūta-Gītā. 1 2

116) panca-bhūtātmakarī viśvarī marīci-jala-sannibham
kasyāpy aho namaskuryām aham eko niranjanah.

Avadhūta-Gītā: 1.3

117) āścaryosya vaktā.

Kaṭha-Upaniṣad: 1.2 7.

118) āścaryavat paśyati kaścid enam

Bhagavad-Gītā 2 29

119) tam evam vidvān amṛta īha bhavati
nānyah panthā ayanāya vidyate

Puruṣa-sūkta

120) mana eva manuṣyānārī kāranam bandha-moksayoh

Tripuratāpinī-Upaniṣad: 5 3

121) mano vaco yatra naśaktam-irīturī nūnam katham tatra gurūpadeśatā?

Avadhūta-Gītā: 2 40

122) Iśā āsyaṁ idagm sarvam yat kiṁ ca jagatyām jagattena tyaktena bhunjīthāh mā gṛdhah kasya svid dhanam.

Iśāvāsyā-Upaniṣad: 1

(144) ātmana ākāśaḥ sambhūtaḥ.

Taittirīya-Upaniṣad: 2.1

(145) yato vā imāni bhūtāni . . . tad brahma.

Taittirīya-Upaniṣad: 3.1

(146) ahaṁ ātmā brahma.

Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka-Upaniṣad: 4.4.5

(147) sarvaṁ khalv idaṁ brahma.

Chāndogya-Upaniṣad: 3.3.14

(148) yo brahmāṇaṁ vidadhāti pūrvaṁ vedāṁś ca sarvān prahiṇoti tasmai .

Veda

(149) athāto brahma-jijnāsā.

Brahma-Sūtra: 1.1.1

(150) janmādy asya yataḥ.

Brahma-Sūtra 1.1.2

(151) śāstra-yonitvāt.

Brahma-Sūtra: 1.1.3

(152) tattva samanvayāt.

Brahma-Sūtra: 1.1.4

(153) ikṣater nāśabdaṁ.

Brahma-Sūtra: 1.1.5

(154) aum ity etad akṣaraṁ idaṁ sarvaṁ. tasyopavyākhyānaṁ bhūtaṁ bhavad bhaviṣyad iti sarvaṁ omkāra eva. yac cānyat trikālātitaṁ tad apy omkāra eva. sarvaṁ hy etad brahmāyaṁ ātmā brahma soyaṁ ātmā catuspāt . . .
amātraś caturtho avyavahāryaḥ prapancopaśamaḥ śivo advaita evaṁ omkāra ātmaiva samviśanty ātmanātmānaṁ ya evaṁ veda ya evaṁ veda.

Māṇḍūkya-Upaniṣad: 1

(155) aum ity etad akṣaraṁ ūdgīthaṁ upāsītoḥ iti hy udgāyati tasyopavyākhyānaṁ.

Chāndogya-Upaniṣad: 1.1.1

(156) aum ity brahma. aum itidaṁ sarvaṁ.

Taittirīya-Upaniṣad: 1.8

(157) sa eṣontaś carate bahudhā jāyamānaḥ. aum ity evaṁ dhyāyata ātmānaṁ svastī vaḥ pārāya tamasah parastāt.

Mundaka-Upaniṣad: 2.2.6

- “(11) vedānta sāra sarvasvam jñānam vijnānam eva ca
aham ātmā nirākārah sarva-vyāpi svabhāvatah

Avadhūta-Gītā: 1.5

- “(12) sarvam brahmeti vikhyātam bravīti bahudhā śrutih

Avadhūta-Gītā: 1.13

- “(13) vadanti śrutyah sarvāh nirgunam śuddham avyayam

Avadhūta Gītā: 1.20

- “(14) neti neti śrutir brūyāt anrtam pānca-bhautikam

Avadhūta-Gītā. 1.25

- “(15) nahī nahī mantraṁ chando laksanam

Avadhūta-Gītā: 1.75

- “(16) sa nah piteva sūnavegne sūpāyano bhava
sa ca sva svastaye

Rg-Veda 1.1.2.6

This is translated with the following commentary:—

he agne tvam asmadartham śobhana-prāpti-yuktah bhava tathā asmākam vināśa-rāhityārtham samaveto bhava tatra ubhayatra dṛstāntah yathā sūnave putrārtham pitā samaveto bhavati tadvat

Sāyana-Bhāṣya

- “(17) atarkyam anupramānāt

(Katha-Upaniṣad 1.2.8)

- “(18) naisā tarkena matir āpaneyā proktānyenaiva sujñānāya
preṣṭha

Katha-Upaniṣad: 1.2.9

- “(19) nāyam ātmā pravacanena labhyah na medhayā na bahunā śrutena yam evaisa vṛnute tena labhyah tasyaisa ātmā vṛnute tanūm svām

Kaṭha-Upaniṣad. 1.2.22

- “(20) nāvirito duṣ-cantāt nāśānto nāsamāhitah naśānta
mānaso vāpi prajñānenainam āpnuyāt

Katha-Upaniṣad: 1.2.23

- “(21) yadā yadā hi dharmasya glānir bhavati bhārata
abhyutthānam adharmasya tadātmānam sṛjāmy aham

Bhagavad-Gītā. 4.7

- “(22) idam tu guhya tamam pravakṣyāmy anasūyave

Bhagavad-Gītā: 9.1

(170) teṣāṁ nityābhiyuktānāṁ yoga-kṣemaṁ vahāmy ahaṁ.

Bhagavad-Gītā: 9.22

(171) mad-anugrahāya paramaṁ guhyaṁ adhyātma-samjñitaṁ yat tvayoktaṁ vacas tena mohoyaṁ vigato mama.

Bhagavad-Gītā: 11.1

(172) manyase yadi tac chakyaṁ mayā draṣṭum iti prabho yogeśvara tatho me tvaṁ darśayātmānaṁ avyayaṁ.

Bhagavad-Gītā: 11.4

(173) mayā prasannena tavārjunedaṁ rūpaṁ paraṁ darśitaṁ ātma-yogāt.

Bhagavad-Gītā: 11.47

(174) na veda yajnādhyayanaiḥ na dānaiḥ na ca kṛiyābhīḥ na tapobhir ugraiḥ evaṁ rūpaḥ śakyaḥ ahaṁ nr-loke draṣṭum tvad-anyaena kuru-pravīra

Bhagavad-Gītā: 11.48

(175) sarva-guhyā-tamaṁ bhūyaḥ śṛṇu me paramaṁ vacaḥ iṣṭosi me dr̥dhaṁ iti tato vakṣyāmi te hitaṁ.

Bhagavad-Gītā: 18.64

(176) mā śucaḥ saṁpadaṁ daivīm abhijātosī pāṇḍava

Bhagavad-Gītā: 16.6

(177) tasmāt śāstraṁ pramānaṁ te kāryākārya-vyavasthitau jñātvā śāstra-vidhānoktaṁ karma-kartum ihārhasi.

Bhagavad-Gītā: 16.23

(178) mac-cittaḥ sarva-durgāṇi mat-prasādāt tariṣyasi.

Bhagavad-Gītā: 18.58

(179) man-manā bhava mad-bhakto mad-yājī māṁ namaskuru māṁ evaiṣyasi satyaṁ te pratijāne priyosi me.

Bhagavad-Gītā: 18.65

(180) imāṁ kathāṁ uktavato guroḥ tad-yuktasya tattvaṁ hi samaṁ prakūśate.

(Avadhūta-Gītā: 2.40)

(181) vindati vindati nahi nahi yatra
chando-lakṣaṇaṁ nahi nahi tatra.

Avadhūta-Gītā: 5.32

(182) kṛpāluḥ . . . sarvopakāraḥ.

Avadhūta-Gītā: 8.4

“” guru-prajñā-prasādena mūrkho vā yadi paṇḍitaḥ yas tu sambudhyate tattvaṁ virakto bhava-sāgarāt
Avadhūta-Gītā · 2 23

“” kasyāpy aho namaḥ kuryām ahaṁ eko niraṇjanaḥ
Avadhūta-Gītā · 1 3

“” pīṇca-bhūtātmaḥ viśvaṁ marīci-jala-sannibhaṁ
Avadhūta-Gītā · 1 3

“” yenedaṁ pūrtaṁ sarvaṁ
Avadhūta-Gītā · 1 2

“” sarva-śūnyaṁ aśūnyaṁ ca satyāsatyaṁ na vidyate
svabhāva-bhāvaṭaḥ proktaḥ
Avadhūta-Gītā · 1 76

“” jñānaṁ na tarho na samādhi-yogo na deśa-kālaḥ na gurūpadeśaḥ svabhāva-samvittir ahaṁ ca tattvaṁ
ākāśa kalpaḥ sahajaḥ dhruvaḥ ca
Avadhūta-Gītā · 1 58

“” svabhāva-bhāvaṭaḥ proktaḥ
śāstra-samvitti-pūrvakaḥ
Avadhūta-Gītā · 1 76

“” nopāśako naivaṁ upāśya-rūpaṁ
na copadeśo na ca me kriyā ca samvit-svarūpaḥ ca kathaṁ vadāmi svarūpi-nirvāṇaṁ anāmayohaṁ
Avadhūta-Gītā · 4 8

“” iha-sarva-nirantara-sarva-cite iha kevala-niścala-sarva-cite dvi-padādi vivarjita-sarva-cite kūṇu roḍiśi mānasi sarva-samaṁ
Avadhūta-Gītā · 5 21

“” mana eva nirantara-sarva-gataḥ hy avīśāla-vīśāla-vihīna-param mana eva nirantara-sarva-śivaḥ manisāpi kathaṁ vacasā ca kathaṁ
Avadhūta-Gītā · 6 3

“” grāhita-viditaṁ nahi satyaṁ iti viditā-viditaṁ satyaṁ iti yadi caika-nirantara-sarva-śivaḥ viśayendriya-buddhi-manāmsi kathaṁ?
Avadhūta-Gītā · 6 8

- (104) katham iha tattvaṁ vindati yatra
rūpaṁ-arūpaṁ katham-ihā tatra
gaganākāraḥ paramo yatra viṣayīkaraṇaṁ katham iha tatra.

Avadhūta-Gītā: 7.5

- (105) bodha-vibodha-vihīna-param.

Avadhūta-Gītā: 5.15

- (106) avikalpa-vikalpaṁ.

Avadhūta-Gītā: 5.18

- (107) pratyakṣaṁ cāparokṣaṁ ca

Avadhūta-Gītā: 1.35

- (108) laghu-dīrgha-vicāra;
bhinna-vibhinna-vicāra;
bahir-antara-sandhi-vicāra;
carā-cara-bheda-vicāra.

Avadhūta-Gītā: 5.4-7-9-10

- (109) ekaṁ eva samaṁ tattvaṁ vadanti hi vipaścitāḥ.

Avadhūta-Gītā: 1.22

- (200) manyante yoginaḥ sarvaṁ.

Avadhūta-Gītā: 1.71

- (201) gurūpadeśatā.

Avadhūta-Gītā: 1.58

- (202) iti tattvamasi prabhṛti-śrutibhiḥ pratipāditam ātmani tattvamasi
tvaṁ upādhi vivarjita-sarva-samaṁ.

Avadhūta-Gītā: 5.2

- (203) imāṁ kathāṁ uktavato guros tad-yuktasya
imāṁ kathāṁ uktavato guros tad-yuktasya
tattvaṁ hi samaṁ prakāśate.

Avadhūta-Gītā: 2.40

- (204) sarvaṁ brahmeti vikhyātam bravīti bahudhā śrutiḥ.

Avadhūta-Gītā: 1.3

- (205) vadanti śrutayaḥ sarvāḥ nirgunaṁ śuddhamavyayaṁ.

Avadhūta-Gītā: 1.5

- (206) tattvaṁ asyādi-vākyena svātmāhi pratipāditāḥ.

Avadhūta-Gītā: 1.25

- (207) neti neti śrutir brūyāt anṛtaṁ.
pāṇca-bhautikaṁ.

Avadhūta-Gītā: 1.25

- (100) bahudhā śrutayah pravadanti yato
Atadhūta-Gītā: 5 31
- (101) bahudhā śrutayah pravadanti
Atadhūta-Gītā. 6 1
- (102) aum iti gaditam
Atadhūta-Gītā. 5 1
- (11) na śūnya-rūpaṁ na viśūnya-rūpaṁ na śuddha-rūpaṁ na viśuddha rūpaṁ rūpaṁ-virūpaṁ na bhavāmi kimcit svarūpa-rūpaṁ paramārtha-tattvaṁ
Atadhūta-Gītā 3 45
- (111) vedo na dikṣā na ca munḍanakriyā
 gurur na śiṣyah.
Atadhūta-Gītā. 2 32
- (112) vindati vindati nahi nahi yatra
 chando-lakṣaṇaṁ nahi nahi tatra
Atadhūta-Gītā. 4 25
- (113) avadhūta-lakṣaṇaṁ varmaṁ jñātavyaṁ bhagavattamaṁ
 veda-varnārtha-tattvajñaṁ veda-vedānta-vādiḥ
Atadhūta-Gītā: 8 5
- (114) sarvaṁ jagad viddhi
Atadhūta-Gītā: 1-41
- (115) sphuraty eva jagat kṛtsnaṁ
Atadhūta-Gītā 1-61
- (117) pañca bhūtātmakaṁ viśvaṁ
Atadhūta-Gītā: 1 3
- (118) vyomādi pañcakaṁ
Avadhūta Gītā. 1 46
- (119) śabdādi pañcakasy āsya
Atadhūta-Gītā. 1 16
- (120) mahadādi jagat sarvaṁ
Atadhūta-Gītā 1 45
- (121) mahadādi jagat sarvaṁ na kuḥ cit pratibhāti me
Atadhūta-Gītā. 2 45
- (122) mahadādīni bhūtāni. . . .
Atadhūta-Gītā. 2 8

- (223) bāhyabhāvaṁ bhavedviśvaṁ
antaḥ prakṛtiḥ ucyate.

Avadhūta-Gītā: 2.19

- (224) (enedaṁ pūritaṁ sarvaṁ)
ātmanaivātmanātmani

Avadhūta-Gītā: 1 2

- (225) yasya svarūpāt sacarācaram jagat utpadyate.
tiṣṭhati liyatepivā

Avadhūta-Gītā: 2.36

- (226) kālātrayam yadī ca neti katham diśaśca.

Avadhūta-Gītā. 3 20

- (227) vedā na lokāḥ na surāḥ na yajnaḥ varnāśramo naiva kulam na jātiḥ na dhūma-mārgo na ca dīpti-mārgo brahmaika-rūpaṁ paramārthatattvaṁ

Avadhūta-Gītā: 1 34

- (228) bhrānti-jñānam sthitaṁ bāhyaṁ samyak jñānaṁ ca madhyagam
madhyān madhyataram jneyam nārikeḷa-phalāmbuvat

Avadhūta-Gītā: 2 20

- (229) What is stated is implied in the passages such as:—
śabdādī pancakasyāśya naivāsi tvam na te punaḥ.

Avadhūta-Gītā: 1 16

- (230) atitānāgataṁ karma vartamānaṁ tathaiva ca
na karomi na bhunjāmi iti me niścalā matiḥ

Avadhūta-Gītā: 1 72

- (231) aho citta katham bhrāntaḥ pradhāvasi piśācavat.

Avadhūta-Gītā: 1.18

- (232) (233) gurur . . śiṣyo . . . saṁpadaḥ.

Avadhūta-Gītā: 2 32

- (234) What is stated is implied in the passages like—yoga-viyogaḥ rahito yogi bhoga-vibhogaḥ rahito bhogī.

Avadhūta-Gītā: 7-9

- (235) ātmānaṁ cāmṛtaṁ hitvā abhinnaṁ mokṣaṁ avyayaṁ
gato hi kutsitaḥ kākaḥ vartate narakam prati

Avadhūta-Gītā: 8-10

- (236) vistādi-narakaṁ ghoram bhagam ca parinirmitam
kimu paśyasi re citta katham tatraiva dhāvasi.

Avadhūta-Gītā: 8 18

“(11) dharmādaṁ mokṣa-paryantaṁ nirihāṁ sarvathāvayaṁ kathaṁ rāga-virāgaś ca kalpayanti vipaścitāḥ?

Atadhūta-Gītā: 7.14

“(12) na hi mokṣa-padaṁ na hi bandha-padaṁ na hi puṇya-padaṁ na hi pāpa-padaṁ na hi pūrṇa-padaṁ na hi rīkta-padaṁ kimu roḍiṣi mānaśi sarva-samaṁ

Atadhūta-Gītā 5.19

“(13) bodha-vibodhaś ca satataṁ yukto dvaitādvaitaṁ kathaṁ iha muktaḥ?

Avadhūta-Gītā. 7.10

“(14) sarvaṁ brahmeti vikhyātaṁ bravīti bahudhā śrutiḥ

Atadhūta-Gītā: 1.13

“(15) All that is stated is supported by the passages such as — ātmaiva kevalaṁ sarvaṁ bhedābhedo na vidyate.

Atadhūta-Gītā: 1.4

aham ekaṁ idaṁ sarvaṁ

Atadhūta-Gītā. 1.10

samaṁ hi sarveṣu akhaṇḍitaḥ

Atadhūta-Gītā: 1.11

ātmānaṁ sarvatraikaṁ . akhaṇḍaṁ

Atadhūta-Gītā: 1.12

saṁpurnatvāt na gṁāmi

Atadhūta-Gītā: 2.6

akhaṇḍitaṁ anākāro

vartate kevalaḥ śivaḥ

Atadhūta-Gītā. 7.13

“(16) All that is stated is supported by passages such as.—
ātmanyevātmanā sarvaṁ tvayā pūrṇaṁ niraṇtaraṁ

Atadhūta-Gītā. 1.26

na tvaṁ nāhaṁ jagannedāṁ sarvaṁ ātmaiva kevalaṁ

Atadhūta-Gītā. 1.15

śabdādi pañcakasyāśya naivāsi tvaṁ na te punaḥ
tvaṁ eva paramaṁ tattvaṁ

Atadhūta-Gītā: 1.16

mahadādi jagat sarvaṁ na kiṁ cit pratibhāti me
brahmaiva kevalaṁ sarvaṁ

Atadhūta-Gītā: 1.45

(243) dvaitādvaita-vivarjitam

Avadhūta-Gītā: 1.36

(244) aho māyā mahāmoho dvaitādvaita-vikalpanā.

Avadhūta-Gītā: 1.61

(245) advaitarūpaṁ akhilam . . . dvaitasvarūpaṁ akhilam.
katham vadāmi.

Avadhūta-Gītā: 3.5

(246) gaganopamaṁ tu.

Avadhūta-Gītā: 2.12

(247) nirmūla-mūla-rahito.

Avadhūta-Gītā: 2.12

(248) sahajaṁ ajaṁ acintyaṁ . . svarūpaṁ.

Avadhūta-Gītā: 2.30

(249) saḍanga- yogān na tu naiva śuddhaṁ mano-vināśān na tu naiva śuddhaṁ gurūpadesān na tu naiva śuddham svayaṁ ca tattvaṁ svayaṁ eva buddhaṁ.

Avadhūta-Gītā: 1.48

(250) jñānam na tarko na samādhi-yogo
na deśa-kālau na gurūpadeśaḥ
svabhāva-samvittir ahaṁ ca tattvaṁ
ākāśa-kalpam sahajaṁ dhruvaṁ ca.

Avadhūta-Gītā: 1.58

(251) rāga-dvesa-vinirmuktaḥ sarva-bhūta-hite rataḥ dṛḍha-bodhaś ca dhīraś ca sa gacchet paramaṁ padam.

Avadhūta-Gītā: 2.24

(252) sahajaṁ ajaṁ acintyaṁ yas tu paśyet svarūpaṁ ghaṭati yadī yatheṣṭam lipyate naiva doṣaiḥ sakṛdapi tad-abhāvāt karma kiñcin na kuryāt tad api na ca vibaddhaḥ saṁyamī vā tapasvī.

Avadhūta-Gītā: 2.30

(253) vedo na dīkṣā na ca munḍana-kriyā gurur na śiṣyo na ca yatra saṁpadaḥ mudrādikaṁ cāpi na tatra bhāṣate taṁ īśaṁ atmānaṁ upaiti śāśvataṁ.

Avadhūta-Gītā: 2.32

(254) guruśiṣya-vivarjita-tattva-param.

Avadhūta-Gītā: 5.28

1111 samsthitam dvaitam advaitam bijakoṭa iva drumah jagat cit-paramānvantah
 yah paśyati sa paśyati

1112 na dvaitam naiva cādvaitam na ca bijam na cānkuraḥ na sthūlam na ca vā sūkṣmam na jātam jātam eva ca.

Yogaśāṣṭha · Utpattiḥprakaraṇa Sarga 21: 97-98

1113 sama-rasa-magno bhāvita-pūtaḥ
 pralapati tattvaṁ param avadhūtaḥ.

Avadhūta-Gītā · 7 15

1114 imāṁ kathāṁ uktavato guros tad-yuktasya tattvaṁ
 hi samam prakāśate

Avadhūta-Gītā 2 40

1115 svabhāva-bhāvataḥ proktaṁ śāstra-samvitti-pūrvakam

Avadhūta-Gītā: 1 76

1116 tasmā cittam sarvato raksanīyam svasthe citte buddhayah sambhavanti

Avadhūta-Gītā, 8 27

1117 dattātreyāḥ adhūtena nirmitānandarūpinā ye paṭhanti ca śṛṇvanti teṣāṁ naiva punarbhavaḥ

Avadhūta-Gītā: 8 28

1118 atmā āre draṣṭavyaḥ śrotavyo mantavyo nididhyāsitavyaḥ.

Bṛhad-Āraṇyaka. 2 4 5

INDEX

- Absolute, the, xii, 140
 Absolutism, 39
 Adhvaṭma, 103
 Advaita, xiii, 5, 16, 239, 240, 243, 245
 Advaita-bhāva, 77, 239
 Advaita-dṛṣṭi, 239
 Advaita-vāsana, 114
 Ahankāra-tattva, 131
 Ānanda, 107, 111, 245, 250
 Anyathā-khyāti, 123
 Aparokṣa, 125
 Apauruṣeya, 102, 104, 105, 110
 Āpta, 91, 104
 Arjuna, 116
 Āśrama, 133
 Ātma-jñāni, 247
 Ātman, 48, 109-10, 112-3, 115, 143
 Ātma-samvitti, 123-4
 Aum, 112 et seq
 Avadhūta, 30, 129, 245-6, 248
 Avadhūta-Gīta, 114, 117-9, 125, 151
 et seq, 247-9; philosophy of, 86 et seq
 Avasthās, 107
 Avidyā, 6

 Bādarāyana's Vedānta Sūtra, 4, 80, 243
 Bergson, 14-5, 241
 Bhagavad-Gīta, 17, 63-4, 66, 69, 90, 116, 240, 247, compared with Avadhūta-Gīta, 86
 Bhāṣavata-Purāṇa, 51
 Bhṛama, 32 et seq
 Bradley, 14
 Brahman, 4, 20, 62, 66, 110-1, 115, 122, 132, 140-1, 143, 246
 Brāhmanī, 46
 Brahma-Sūtra, 111
 Brahmavidyā, 8, 111
 Buddha, 99
 Buddhi, 16

 Cārvāka, 90-1, 94

 Dākṣiṇāmūrti-Stotra, 7, 52
 Dāṛṇa, 90-1, 241, 246

 Dattādvaita, xiii, 118
 Dattātreyā, in mythology, xi, xii;
 in Śāṇḍilya-Upaniṣad 21, the All complete, 249
 Detachment, 247
 Devī-Bhāṣavata, 57
 Dharma-sarvsthāpana, 96
 Dvaita, 239-40

 Empirical philosophies, 93
 Epistemology, 119 et seq
 Equipose, philosophy of, 146, 148, truth of, 238, 249

 God, grace of, 92, idea of, 95, 136, 142, 145
 Guru, 127
 Gurūpadeśa, 127

 Hegel, 14

 Illusion, 133
 Intuition, 94, 241
 Īśvara, 94, 102
 Īśvarānugraha, xii, 3, 4, 6, 18, 110, 241, 249

 James, William, 14, 241
 Jina, 99
 Jīva, 132
 Jīvanmukta, xiii, 17, 245
 Jīvanmukti, 58-9, 242, 245
 Jung, 15, 241

 Kaivalya, 42-3, 126, 250
 Kālidāsa, 70
 Knowledge, theory of, 120, sources of, 127; relative value of, 127, in essence, 137, not mere idea, 244
 Kṛṣṇa, 116

 Language, 102-3
 Linga-mahā-purāṇa, 34
 Linga-śarīra, 63

Madhva, 105, 113
 Mahat-tattva, 131-2
 Manas, 121, 125-6, 246
 Mānasollāsa, 7
 Mārga, dhūma, 134; dipti, 134
 Māya, 5, 27-29, 98
 Mīmāṃsa, 90
 Mokṣa, 6, 143 et seq., 244, 249
 Mysticism, 15

Naciketas, 115
 Nārāyaṇa, 24
 Nidāgha, 9, 10
 Nous, 94
 'Numinous' experience, 80
 Nyāya, 90, 94
 Nyāya-vaīśeṣika, 99, 241

Ontology, 119, 130 et seq.
 Otto, Rudolf, 80

Parmenides, 94
 Patañjali, 13, 16
 Patañjali-Sūtra, 73
 Perception, 125
 Pessimism, 98
 Philosophy, conception of, 93, 138
 Plato, 14
 Plotinus, 14
 Prakṛti, 131-2
 Pramāṇa, 100, 105
 Pratibhā, xii, 13, 16, 18, 109, 117, 119, 241, 247
 Pratyakṣa, pāramārthika and yaugika, 99
 Psycho-analysis, 15
 Puruṣārthas, 133
 Pūrva-mīmāṃsa, 99

Radhakrishnan, 16
 Rāmānuja, 105, 113
 Rationalisation, 15
 Rbhu, 9, 10
 Reality, 135
 Relativity, 142
 Religion, and philosophy, 95 et seq.
 Ṛṇatraya, 238
 Ṛṣis, 239

Śabda, 100-1, 104
 Śabdabrahma, 79
 Śabdapramāṇa, 90
 Samādhi, 15, 126
 Samanvaya, 112, 114, 243
 Samarasa, 114, 130, 245, 249-50
 Samarasa-magna, 135
 Sampradāya, 110
 Samskāra, 18, 76, 238
 Sāṅkhya, 90, 99
 Śankarācārya, 5, 6, 12, 54, 105, 113
 Śāstra-samvitti, 123
 Sat-kārya-vāda, 131
 Science, and philosophy, 240, 241
 Śiva-Rahasya, 25
 Sohambhāva, 25
 Spinoza, 14
 Śraddhā, 97, 247
 Śucīndram, 75 n
 Śuddhāvaita, 151
 Sureśvarācārya, 7
 Svabhāva-bhāva, 120, 121
 Svabhāva-samvitti, 120

Tanmātras, 131
 Tarka, 126, 246
 Theism, 39
 Tripurā-Rahasya 6, 8, 51, 75, 84,
 87, 240
 Turiya, 44, 107
 Turiyāvasthā, 91

Upadeśa, 138
 Upaniṣads
 Adhyātma, 53
 Advayatāraka, 44, 68
 Aitareya, 167, 182
 Avadhūta, 31
 Bhasmajābāla, 37
 Brahma Vidyā, 47
 Brhadāranyaka xiii, 8, 62, 128,
 135, 140, 146-8, 152-6, 158-61,
 163, 167, 169-70, 172-3, 176-80, 182-5, 188-91, 193, 196-9, 201, 240, 249
 Brhajjābāla, 32, 81
 Chāndogya, 112, 154-61, 163-4, 167-8, 170-2, 177-9, 182-3,
 186-7, 190-1, 195, 200.
 Dakṣiṇāmūrti, 29, 38
 Dattātreyā, xii, 24, 53, 244

Upaniṣads —cont

- Dhyāna-bindu, 40
 Gopālapūrva tāpiny, 41
 Hamsa, 68, 70
 Hayagrīva, 40
 Īśvāśya, 6, 64, 108, 152, 154-5
 Jābāla-Darśana, 51
 Kaṭha, 60, 62, 64, 66, 69, 88-9, 109,
 115, 152-4, 156 60, 162, 164-7,
 169, 171-6, 179, 181, 185,
 188-9, 191-4, 198-9
 Kaivalya, 71
 Kena, 66, 156-7, 163, 169, 190
 Maitreyi, 47
 Maṇḍala Brāhmaṇa, 30
 Māṇḍūkya, 4, 88, 112, 152-3, 158, 175, 178
 Mantrika, 29, 39
 Muṇḍaka, 59, 72, 88, 112, 153-6, 159-61, 168, 174, 181, 184, 186-7, 190-1, 195-7, 200, 246
 Nārada-parivrajaka, 31
 Nṛsimhottara tāpiny, 28
 Paramahansa, 31
 Praśna, 166, 170
 Rāmapūrvatāpiny, 26, 38
 Rāmarahasya 26
 Śāṇḍilya, xii 17, 21-2, 78, 242, 247
 Sanyāsa, 32
 Śarabha 27
 Sarvasāra 28, 43 49
 Śāthyanayanīya 45
 Śvetāśvatara, 69
 Taittirīya, 4, 79, 112, 153-5, 167, 171, 179 187, 190, 194, 198
 Tejo-bindu, 46, 56
 Tripādvibhūti mahā nārāyaṇa, 28

Upaniṣads —cont

- Tripuratāpiny, 38
 Vārāha, 29, 56
 Yājñavalkya, 28
 Yoga, 12
 Yoga-tattva, 37, 42-3
 Uttara-mīmāṃsa, 246

 Vairāgya, 244
 Vaiśeṣika, 131
 Varna, 133
 Vāsana, 238
 Veda, 90-1, 105 et seq, 117, 129-30, 138-40, essence of, 143, 246, 248
 Vedānta, 7, 90, 110-2, 114, 129-30, 138-40, 246
 Vedavyāsa, 100
 Verbal testimony, 90, 101, 104, 126
 Vicāra, 126
 Vidyāranya, 59
 Vipra, 5, 46, 87-8
 Vismaya, 245
 Viṣṇupurāṇa, 8-10, 240
 Vitarka, 126

 Whitehead, 13, 241
 Women, 248

 Yājñavalkya, 8
 Yoga, 43-4, 73, 125, 241, 246
 Yoga-Sūtra, 13
 Yoga-Vāsista-Rāmāyana, 3, 5, 11, 147, 240
 Yogi-pratyakṣa, 125